SHINGLE REPLACES DOPE PROCESS

After supper she put on a saucepan and pretty soon the house smelled like the slaughter house south of town and father looked up over the paper and said: "Darn it, Mary, why don't you cook that cussed stuff in the day-time?"

Oh! Sassafras Tea

It was sassafras tea. You took it to thin the blood. Um-hum-h-h. You woke up in the night and tasted it, and you tasted it in the morning. You went to school with it, and the only consolation you had was the knowledge that all the rest of the boys had gone through similar torture. Yes, indeed. There was the good old days.

Something seems to have gone wrong of late. Especially this year. Not a scrap of swamp root or sassafras or blood rot or any of the blood thinning dope has appeared. The drug stores have their windows full of books and candy and perfumes and magazines and rubber doings.

Kids are Ready

It doesn't seem like spring, and the boys and girls are struggling along with their blood as thick as New Orleans molasses, and the ghastly fingers of Spring Fever just trembling with eagerness to seize them.

The new Harrison drug law put an awful crimp in some of the spring tonics, and some illuminating articles in magazines put the crimps in some more and the plain herbs and roots have lost their popularity. Perhaps people are losing faith in grandmas, especially after finding out that some of their best and sagest advice is laughed at by physicians.

Was a Joke

Thinning the blood in the spring-time seems to be one of the best jokes grandmas ever knew. A physician was asked the other day what to do for a boy who wouldn't bring in the coal because he was "dred" all the time and preferred to lie on the lounge to going to the grocery.

It's "Spring Fever"

In the old days they would have called it "spring fever" and poured the herbs down him, but Doc went out and took a look, and what do you suppose he advised?

"Give him one large shingle after supper, applied where it will do the most good."

It was tried and worked fine. The boy is one of the handiest bits of bric-a-brac you ever saw now. Truant officers and report cards and various modern inventions opposed to "hooky" also have done a great deal to cure thick blood. No use in being sick until an hour after the bell has stopped ringing if you have to stay in the house to avoid the truant officer.

Yes! Who Knows?

Perhaps it is a bit early in Charlevoix. Maybe the roots and herbs will yet appear and the cycle of the seasons go on their appointed way without a tripping missing. Who knows?

DEATH COMES SUDDENLY

Miss Eva Himebauch Drops Dead in Office of Petoskey Physician.

It is seldom we are called upon to relate a sadder instance where death suddenly takes away a loved one, than that which has cast a gloom over the home of Mr. and Mrs. Daniel Himebauch, two of Charlevoix's oldest and most respected residents.

About nine o'clock Tuesday night they were notified that their daughter, Eva, had died very suddenly in the office of a physician in Petoskey. Miss Himebauch had left for that city on the previous day where she intended to spend a day or so working in the tailoring establishment of H. C. Carlzen. About four o'clock Tuesday afternoon she visited the office of Dr. Regeraert, and from what can be learned, died suddenly a short time afterwards. She had been in ill health for the past six or eight weeks, and her death is thought to be due to heart failure.

Miss Himebauch was born in Canada and came to Michigan when but five years of age, and has lived in this vicinity practically ever since. She was 24 years old last June.

The remains were brought from Petoskey on the 2:20 train Wednesday afternoon, and taken to the home of her parents. Funeral services will take place from the Congregational church Thursday forenoon at 11 o'clock. The bereaved parents have the deepest sympathy of the entire community.

Teachers' Examination.

The regular examination will be held in the High School building in the City of Charlevoix on Thursday, Friday and Saturday, April 23-24 and May 1, beginning at 8:00 a. m.

The questions in reading will be based on "The House of Seven Gables."

Applicants wishing papers forwarded to other counties will write with pen. Paper will be furnished.

Respectfully submitted,

later sagged in front of a door at the shop.

"New," said Hunt, "a little work for you, friend Baird."

"I'm with you, if there's any excitement in it."

"There'll be some. I want to keep a watch on that garage and junk shop where they nearly got you that night. Something strange about that junk shop. People go in there and don't come out again. There's some kind of a tunnel, and between you and me and the gate post this tunnel leads to the marble home of Mme. Du Val."

"I never heard anything about a tunnel," said Baird honestly.

"For you saw but one of the facets of this clever diamond woman. In that day you were using her; consequently she did not tell you any of her secrets. Now you watch the hut and I'll watch the marble palace, and then we'll compare notes as to whom we see enter or leave the hut and the palace."

But when they compared notes they had nothing that was important.

About four weeks later, however, they were rewarded. Baird saw Bruce enter the hut and disappear, and Detective Hunt saw Bruce come out of the villa without apparently having entered it. Hunt proceeded to follow his man back to town. Bruce had an office in one of the downtown skyscrapers. The door had no business announcement, such as is usually found upon office doors. There was merely a number, and below that in small letters the word "private."

Private, Hunt was sure this office was. He hung about in the shadow until Bruce left, when he set about calmly to pick the lock. He was rather curious to see what kind of an office this was, the found many interesting documents, but nothing incriminating. The smuggler was a shrewd fowl.

Suddenly Hunt heard footsteps. He heard a key in the lock. Bruce had returned! Hunt made a quick scramble out of the window, where he clung to the iron shutter. The effort was worth his while. The man who accompanied Bruce was none other than Howard, the superintendent of the Zadora diamond mines.

This conversation was going to be interesting. Bruce had put one over. Evidently Howard's boat had been a day from the trip, as he had been scheduled to arrive the following morning.

"You have the gems?" asked Bruce.

"I have."

"You pulled them through the customs?"

"I did. But that does not mean that I intended to keep their arrival a secret from the United States government."

"Oh!" was the uncommittal utterance of Bruce.

"Now, Mr. Bruce," went on Howard, "there is another claimant to this mine."

"And with not a foot to stand on," said Bruce triumphantly.

"Well, that remains to be seen."

"What do you mean?"

"Why, that this mine has got to be shared out. I'm honest, Mr. Bruce. Detective Hunt grinned from behind his shutter.

"Nobody accused you of not being honest," said Bruce indignantly. "We'll go right now and get the facts as our side know them, and you'll realize that it will take a long while in court to pry this mine out of our hands. Come along. Are the gems in that valise?"

"In a false bottom."

"Ah!"

Detective Hunt did not like the sound of that explanation. He was mighty glad that he had detailed Baird to keep an eye on the garage. Bruce meant to play some trick on Howard. There was nothing for Hunt to do but trust to Baird's watchfulness.

Sure enough, half an hour later, Baird saw Bruce and the stranger enter the hut, and almost immediately two rough looking men and another whom Baird recognized as Gyp the gun man came into view. Baird remained in his hiding place. It was going to be a long wait, and he wanted the men to depart before he left. He wanted Gyp's status in this affair.

Meanwhile Bruce and Howard arrived at Mme. Du Val's through the tunnel. This tunnel did not particularly reassure the superintendent of the Zadora diamond mine. Why all this bother to enter his employer's house? Were they smuggling the gems, then, and this mine was for Madame's gem? He did not like the business at all. He was more than ever inclined to the opinion that he had been long the dupes of these people.

But Mme. Du Val impressed him. The beauty of her home and its luxuries for a long time upset his previous conclusions. This woman was already rich. Why all this mystery? He took a dislike to Radcliffe immediately. The other individuals he met he rather ignored. But he is duty bound to turn over his present assignment of diamonds. The other claimant must establish proofs. That was all there was to it.

While Madame engaged his attention Bruce signaled to Radcliffe, and they stroled out into the conservatory.

"That man," whispered Bruce, "is thinking of going to the other side. Madame All's niece has tumbled to the fact that this mine is really hers. You already knew that she held that gold mine in Montana, worth a king's ransom. Well, I've faked stuff to make her believe that a husband has destroyed the mine and that the trustees have descended with the funds. This was done with the idea of making Zadora and Storm like out to Montana to investigate. Once there was a mighty slim chance of their ever coming back. But, oddly enough, they have accepted the fake as truth and have made no effort to go out there. I'll write another anonymous note advising them that it would pay to investigate the report. But meantime there's this man Howard to take care of. We'll warn him, and if he does not fall in with us—why, he must be pushed off the board."

"I'll take care of that end of it," agreed Radcliffe. "We're running too smoothly to let a foot cog us up. Trust me."

They returned to the salon, and a quarter of an hour later Bruce and Howard departed.

Gyp and his two companions then entered the salon and were given a small bag with the best of the gems. They were to be out in one hour in case Howard jumped the traces. Gyp and his companions returned to the old garage or junk shop. The moment they left the hut for the street Radcliffe followed. He had an inkling that they were going to the diamond cutter's with the Howard collection, and he deberlined that the game should never get that far.

Mrs. Ramsey, with whom Zadora was living, knocked to say that a Mr. Baird was anxious to see Zadora.

"Send him right up!"

Baird was greeted cordially. He put the valise on the table, opened it, lifted the false bottom, and there lay a handful of uncut diamonds, a comfortable fortune for any reasonable person.

"What has happened?" demanded Zadora, greatly excited.

Briefly Baird recounted his adventure, and when he had done the girl seized Storm and began to wait him around the room. But these uncut stones could not be kept in the house, nor could they take them and sell them or deposit them in a safety box at a bank. What to do with them now they had them? Until the mine was lawfully proved to be Zadora's legally they had no right to them. Merely they had, of course. Then Mrs. Ramsey made a suggestion.

"Why not hide them in your flower pot?"

They congratulated Mrs. Ramsey upon her happy thought. After the stones were hidden Baird took his departure.

Gyp and his frightened companions after having hunted fruitfully for the man with the ivory headed cane finally concluded that the best thing they could do would be to go to Mme. Du Val's.

They returned to the salon, and a quarter of an hour later Bruce and Howard departed.

Gyp and his two companions then entered the salon and were given a small bag with the best of the gems. They were to be out in one hour in case Howard jumped the traces. Gyp and his companions returned to the old garage or junk shop. The moment they left the hut for the street Radcliffe followed. He had an inkling that they were going to the diamond cutter's with the Howard collection, and he

Temperance

(Conducted by the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union.)

BEER A POISON.

(By T. D. CROTHERS, M. D.)
The boasted claims that beer is a food and gives vigor and strength are contradicted by statistics. In Munich, Germany, where the largest quantity of beer is consumed, per capita, at any city, the mortality rate from heart and kidney diseases is double that of any other city. Everywhere this is confirmed. The beer drinker dies early from diseases of the heart and kidneys.

If beer had any food elements and were a tonic, exact measurements and studies of statistics would confirm it, but the evidence from these sources is entirely the opposite. The congested face, bloated body and dullness of body and mind are the best evidences of the poisoning and degenerative processes going on. There can be no conflict of opinions on this, because it can be measured and stated in mathematical terms, regardless of the theories.

Alcohol absorbs the water from the cells and tissues, breaks up and diminishes their nutritive power, while beer creates new fermentive and chemical changes in the stomach. These processes are cumulative, not only destroying the balance between waste and repair, but adding immensely in the waste, which permanently disturbs and destroys the vigor and health of the body.

Beer is a most insidious poison because it produces other poisons, and starts new processes of degeneration that are unknown until the final collapse reveals them.

PROBABLE ACTION OF SWEEDEN.

In Sweden to be the second nation of the world to outlaw the liquor traffic—the first to follow the example of Russia? From the statements of Mr. Frederick Peterson in a recent magazine article it seems probable. He says: "The present crown prince, who will be the next king if he survives his father, is a total abstainer and forbids the use of liquor in his household. Both houses of the parliament are increasing their temperance membership. Edvard J. Wavinsky, the head of the Good Templars of the World, is the temperance leader, as well as leader of the Social Democrats in the upper house." Mr. Peterson states that "13 of the 220 members of the house are total abstainers, and the majority of these are Social Democrats. This party has 87 members in the lower house and 14 in the upper, it being in the majority. In 1896 there was one member representing the Socialists in the lower house and exceedingly few total abstainers. Now the Socialists are the leaders on this question. The working classes, the small wage earners, constitute this party. Who better than they know the evil of Intemperance? Wm. municipal suffrage has placed many able women in city governments. They are leaders in the temperance army, and it is sublime to see them and hear them speak for home against the rum-seller whether it be in the public to run or in the city council."

LAST WORD IN BREWERY BUILDING.

An immense placard on the top of a big brewery recently erected in Philadelphia was a cause for comment by citizens who saw in it an unintentional prophecy. It read, "The Last Word in Brewery Building." Harry H. Paley of Philadelphia, treasurer of the Reading railway and allied corporations, in a speech made at the annual banquet of the Pottsville Y. M. C. A., called attention to the appropriateness of the placard in view of the fact that the liquor traffic is doomed. He declared that the one service for the uplift of society today is the bringing about of the death of the liquor traffic. He said the handwriting is on the wall and all liquor dealers and brewers would do well to get out of the business at once.

SLUMP IN BREWERY VALUES.

The growing temperance sentiment is responsible for the fact that the Pittsburgh Brewing company paid no dividends this year. As a result of the company's action, the common stock was forced down several points, and Pittsburgh Brewing company bonds dropped to a low-record price. Independent Brewing common also declined three-fourths to two and three-fourths.

RESTRICT BEER OUTPUT.

According to the Lokal Anzeiger, restrictions have been imposed on beer production in Germany. First, the brewers were required to cut down the amount of malt 50 per cent. Then a decrease of 40 per cent was ordered—the authorities, later, to fix definitely the amount of malt each brewery may consume.

UNMITIGATED NUISANCE.

The saloon is a nuisance. The evil can no more be confined to the building in which it exists than the odor of a slaughter house to the block in which it is located.—William Jennings Bryan.

WORKINGMAN'S FRIEND.

Every friend of the workingman will vote against the saloon every time he gets a chance, and to close it up, not only on Sunday, but upon every day of the week. P. M. Arthur of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers.

A Metal Polish.

A metal polish that is safe to use about the home is composed of thirty parts alcohol, three parts ammonia water, forty-five parts water, six and one-half parts carbon tetrachloride, eight parts kieselguhr, four parts white bole and eight parts of chalk. These substances can be purchased at a local drug store and should be mixed in the order named. Any grease on metal will be dissolved by this solution.

Worn Ball Bearings.

The fact that ball bearings have become worn does not necessarily mean that a complete new set must be installed. The old ones can be repaired and made almost as good as new. This is done by turning up the races and using larger balls of the size demanded.

To Remove Gloss on Clothing.

Saturate a cloth with white kerosene and use it in pressing in the ordinary way. Have the iron quite warm and go over the cloth slowly so as to make a steam. This will remove all gloss, and it will not come back.

A mechanic should never wear jewelry on the hands while working at a machine, as it is apt to catch on the work and cause a serious injury.

"A Shine in Every Drop"

VICTORIES OVER MODERN GIANTS

1 Samuel 17:48—April 21.
Giants of Old—David and Goliath.
Not by Human Might, but by God's Spirit, or Power—Fighting the Good Fight—Not With Carnal Weapons. Power of the Pebble of Truth.

"If God is for us, who can be against us?"—Romans 8:31.

THE first giants mentioned in the Bible were those who had human mothers, but whose fathers were materialized fallen angels, as recorded in Genesis 6. These all perished in the Deluge of Noah's day. From time to time, however, there have been human giants found. The spies in their report on Canaan told of seeing giants there—sons of Anak. Goliath, whom David slew, was probably a descendant. David, a youth of probably twenty years, visited the army of Israel, in which three of his brethren were soldiers, taking them food and delicacies. He found the army facing the Philistine army, each apparently fearing the other. A champion from the Philistines came forth every morning, a giant in size and strength, brandishing his spear, the head of which weighed twenty-five pounds. He not only defied the Israelites, but his God, declaring that a battle between individuals would settle the war.

David and Goliath.

The Challenge Accepted.

David was amazed that nobody had accepted the challenge. Realizing the Covenant between God and Israel, he accepted the Divine promises implicitly. He wondered at the lack of faith manifested by his countrymen, and intimated that, backed by God's promises, he himself dared to meet Goliath.

Klug Saul had promised great honor to whoever would meet the foe. Young David was brought before him; but he realized that the sneaky youth would be no match for the giant, one blow from whose spear would destroy David. Then the stripling pleaded his cause. As keeper of his father's sheep, he had often delivered them from the mouth and paw of the lion and the bear, so he would give strength for victory in the duty of the hour, the meeting of the giant's insult to Jehovah.

The king was impressed. He would lend David his armor—the best in Israel. But after trying it, David declined it with thanks. Unaccustomed to such armor, he could be himself better without it. He took with him merely his shepherd's staff and sling. Passing over toward the Philistines for the combat, he chose five smooth pebbles from the brook. This slight armament, with God's blessing, was more than sufficient; for he used only one pebble.

The giant was indignant, saying, "Am I a dog, that this boy should come out to meet me with a sling?" According to tradition, he threw back his head and laughed as the lad approached. His helmet fell off, and he was exposed to the sure marksmanship of his despised opponent. The giant stunned, his armorbearer fled. David quickly dispatched him with his own sword, and took his armor as a trophy. Surprised, dismayed, the Philistines fled. The Israelites pursuing them.

How to Meet Modern Giants.

Following Jesus' death, a new Divine order of things began. Those having faith in God still have battles to win, but not with carnal weapons. Their victories, nevertheless, are based upon the same principle which operated favorably with David. Faith in God lies at the basis—the realization that the cause in which they fight is approved of God. A courage proper to their faith, developed in previous victories, gives strength for battling with the most terrifying giants.

Remembering this, each Christian should daily strive to overcome little weaknesses, little frailties—to conquer in the little battles with selfishness, anger, malice, envy, evil-speaking. Victories and experiences gained with God's help in overcoming these give preparation for the greatest trials.

The Divine promise, "To him that overcometh will I grant to sit with Me in My Throne," teaches that a great victory must be won to prove ourselves worthy of the great honor to which God has called His Church. This victory, however, is not always to the strong, but to those whom God will bless. The conflict which God will reward is not strife with friends or neighbors, however unreasonable they may be, but strife against sin and everything which the Divine Law opposes. This strife and victory belong primarily in our own hearts and minds, but will extend, as Divine providence may dictate, in battling against public evils and in support of righteousness.

We are not to forget, however, that the great giant of Sin and Iniquity, which has striven God's people for centuries, will be smitten down only at God's appointed time, and by the Antitype of David—The Christ, Jesus the Head and the Church His Body. Shortly, a shattering of Truth will smite down the opposition and the Antitype David will smite the Millennial Goliath who has to lose the world.

Will Attend in a Body.

The members of the I. O. O. F. lodge have accepted the invitation extended them by Rev. L. C. Vineyard, of the Baptist church, to attend special services the coming Sunday, and will attend in a body. The topic will be: "The Man Who Got Held Up." There will also be special music during the services.

Death of Mrs. Farmer.

Mrs. A. B. Farmer, a former and well known resident of East Jordan, died at the home of her sister, Mrs. S. A. Bush, in this city, last Thursday morning. The remains were taken to East Jordan Saturday, and funeral services held from St. Joseph's church. The cause of her death was pneumonia.

SWEET SIXTEEN

Were They "Different?"

In the alcove leading from their bedroom sat the judge and Mrs. Parker. "There comes Dean Cutler," indifferently remarked Mrs. Parker after a desultory glance at the walk below where she espied a boy of twenty striding up the steps.

"You don't think there's anything serious in his attentions?" asked the judge.

"Thomas!" exclaimed his wife in eloquent denial. "The idea! Virgie and Dean are still boy and girl together. He's barely twenty and she's just sixteen. Mere children! If she's been moping lately it's because he hasn't asked her to the dance tomorrow night. But as for anything serious between them—what put such a notion into your head?"

"Oh, nothing!" he hesitated, dissuaded; then thoughtfully. "Only weren't we just about their age when—"

"Oh, but you and I were different," with placid assurance. "Don't you suppose I know my girl?"

Downstairs in the flickering fire broken twilight of the parlor Dean and Virgie sat in love-like attitude.

Dean was in a low chair before the fireplace; Virgie was on his knees, one fresh, round arm thrown around his ruddy, sunburned neck, the other clasped in both his hands.

He dropped a kiss in the hollow of her elbow near his shoulder, then questioningly looked up at her.

"Are you going to the dance with me tomorrow night?"

"Yes—es. Why didn't you ask me before?" she wistfully demanded, drawing back with a helpless sigh.

It was bewildering how the angel she had felt at his remoteness fled at a look—at a kiss! Would she never cease to be as putty in his hands?

"I knew you wouldn't go with any one else," he said with egotistical assurance, reluctantly letting her go as, at a sound from the stairs, she jumped up and made for the electric switch.

When she came back and posted herself on the arm of his chair the full streaming light discovered to her two eyes on Dean's face, one at his temple, unaccountably concealed by a lock of hair; the other on his cheek, red and angry.

"Why, how did you do this—am I to go?" she cried in alarm, her brown eyes wide with question as she held back the curls from his forehead.

Rising, Dean stepped to the mantel and examined his curls. "Oh, that's nothing," he vaguely replied, turning his back to the fire and pocketing his hands.

"How did you do it?" she repeated with insistent curiosity.

He perceptibly hesitated. Then, "I took a tumble last night—bowling—at the new alley," he mendaciously supplied, jingling coins in his pocket.

"Bowling—last night!—what time?" she took him up, narrowing her eyes as she became cognizant of his uneasy manner.

"Why—I don't know!" he parried, kicking a stray under back on the hearth. "Some time between 9 and 11—"

"And then what did you do?" she probed, rising slowly and approaching him.

A vague presentiment was tugging at her heart. Having been to the new alley herself last night, she knew that he had lied. But why? Was there some ugly truth to conceal?

"Oh, just ran around town with Tom Baker and the bunch," he reluctantly admitted, pressed to the point of irritation.

"What do boys do when they just run around town?" she went on earnestly, putting her hands on her shoulders and turning him toward her. In her love was something of a mother's yearning.

Then like a flash came two and two together. Her face blanched, and her hands fell like dead weights at her sides. She remembered now!

After she and Cousin Wes had left the bowling alley they had stopped in to see the last act at the Empire. When they came out it was nearing midnight. As they passed a certain alleyway that sneaked off Center street a noisy group of boys turned in.

She had distinctly seen the loose belted figure of Tom Baker and another—curly headed, hatless! But she had immediately argued herself out of believing her eyes. Now she felt convinced.

"I saw you downtown last night," came from Virgie's lips in a frozen tone, unlike herself.

"Where?" demanded Dean, flushing darkly.

"Center street, between First and Second West, in an alley."

"Virgie, you didn't! I wasn't there. Some one's been talking. Just let me catch!"

"I saw you myself. Don't lie to me again!"

It was an undreamed of Virgie who confronted him!

"I—I only went in with the boys—to look on," he defensively offered instead. Her sternness put him at a disadvantage, but anything to hold her!

"You said you were at the bowling alley last night and you weren't!" Stampeded, confused, Dean hurried with the truth.

"Well, then—I'll tell you. Only you mustn't be too hard on me. A fellow hit me here with a billiard cue in a place on Columbia alley. And then there was a fight."

"Oh, Dean!" Shuddering under the destruction of hope and faith—a shattered ideal—Virgie hid her face in her hands and sunk into a chair.

"Look at me," he pleaded, falling on his knees beside her and attempting to raise her chin.

But her head only sank lower, and she pushed away his hand. "I can't look at you any more—you lied to me. It wouldn't be the same."

Dean stood up. He looked around the big, familiar room, suddenly grown strange and hostile, and then at the dark head bent because of him.

She was like a flower still, but lifeless, bitten by the frost. A sob clutched his throat, and he tried the hardest thing of all.

"Virgie, I'm not fit to touch your hand—but—can't you forgive me, Virgie—please?" he implored, bending over her with trembling lips and heart smitten with remorse.

But her one vulnerable spot had been pierced. Pain had quenched the flame of her love, and the ashes lay like stones in her breast.

"I don't know. It isn't that. Whether I forgive you or not, it could never be the same," she repeated dully.

Sixteen and twenty, but the lightning had struck.

Dean straightened his shoulders. "Do you want me to go?"

"Yes," with a suggestion of eagerness. "And you had better take this with you."

Holding Virgie's hand he slipped the ring.

The tragedy was complete. This last concrete instance of their parting was as the closing of the casket in a funeral service.

The front door closed, and a man of twenty stumbled down the steps.

"Virgie, didn't you hear the dinner bell?" her mother called her father from the dining room.

"No—I—I don't want any dinner," replied Virgie from the hall where she stood, outwardly calm as a statue inwardly nauseated with the pressure of unshed tears.

"Nonsense! Hurry in here! We've got noodle soup. Where on earth is Dean?" demanded her father, looking up from a steaming tureen. Little poised in the air, as Virgie crept alone into the dining room.

"He—didn't stay," she quietly remarked, slipping into her place at the table.

"What's the matter? Didn't he ask you to the dance?" interrogated her mother, righteously indignant.

"Yes—but—I'm going with father if I go," was the astounding reply.

"Certainly you may go with your father," largely consoled the judge, with a comprehending wink at his wife.

"Of course! That's the very nicest way to go! And what are you thinking of wearing?" pursued Mrs. Parker with tactful enthusiasm.

"I think—I'll wear—I'd like to wear my old white," began Virgie, but at the thought of that dress and its intimate history she could no longer keep back the tears. Choking with sobs, she hurried her face in her mouth and groined her way from the room.

"No, mother," advised the judge as Mrs. Parker made a movement to follow. "Let her have her cry out alone. That young scoundrel—he didn't ask her to that dance at all! Confound him!"

"I suppose not. And those things mean so much when one is just sixteen. You don't imagine it was anything else?" she suggested.

"Of course not—just a spat! He'll call up again tomorrow," and the judge began on his soup with a relish.

"And yet we were about their age when we had our quarrel," renewed Mrs. Parker and found herself with alarm. "Thirty years ago, and this was the first mention of it since that day! Mrs. Parker had been able to forget when she decided to forgive."

"I know, mother," said the judge, reaching over to pat her hand across the table. "But, as you say, they're children. We were children."

The Leading Newspaper in the Best Little City Anywhere

VOL. 33. NUMBER 17

CHARLEVOIX, MICHIGAN, WEDNESDAY, APRIL 28, 1915

PRICE $1.50 PER YEAR

SCHOOL NEEDS A GYMNASIUM

Citizens Should Furnish Place for Boys to Spend Leisure Time.

Leasing of the Skating Rink Last Winter Proves the Great Need of One in City.

That Charlevoix should take some definite stand in an effort to provide for suitable recreation for the younger generation is the opinion of many of the more interested citizens. The statement is not made relative to the summer months, for no city in the country is provided by nature with such an abundance of the "beautiful out of doors" as this city that surrounds Round lake and stretches along the shores of Pine lake and Lake Michigan. But the winter months is the time of the year we refer to, and the one when the city should make an special effort to keep the boys out of the different unhealthy places and off the street.

Last winter through the efforts of a few of the young men of the city, the skating rink was leased for a couple of months. More good was felt from this one thing during the months of March and February than any other like undertaking of past years. It is safe to say that never before has Charlevoix had as healthy a place for the boys to go. But it must not be misunderstood that the rink was leased by private parties, and not by the city, although the city did assist in some ways. No one will say after reconsidering, that the leasing of the rink was a failure.

To get to the point quickly, what is needed in this city is a gymnasium built ostensibly for the public schools but open to the public for similar purposes. The construction of such an edifice is not beyond the reaches of the school district. All that is needed is a sufficient amount of enthusiasm on the part of the taxpayers to warrant their representatives on the Board of Education in going ahead in such an undertaking. No board entrusted with the finances of the public are willing to undertake a movement of this sort without knowing the majority of the people are behind them, and they are still more willing to take upon themselves more work if everybody backs them up. There is no more growing need for systematic training along athletic lines than exist today in this city. In every city of any size we find it equipped with facilities for this training, and more and more it is becoming a necessity in the every day routine of the school boy and girl. Competitive athletics do some things for a few, but the work in the gymnasium does something for everyone. Petoskey saw this need among the boys and girls of that city, and when a new high school was constructed one of the first things mentioned was a gymnasium and regular training as part of the curriculum. Other town and cities in the state of no greater population than Charlevoix could be cited when it comes to discussing physical training.

Speaking of this matter, one person stated that he would rather give real hard cash to the construction of a gymnasium where his boys could play during the winter months, than any other project. This statement is only the opinion of hundreds of others who have boys and who want them to stay off the streets, but who are unable to answer the argument put forward by the boys themselves, "there's nothing else to do, so I'm going down town."

Think this affair over, you who are tax payers and have boys, and you who have grown-ups and are public spirited, and when this proposition ever comes up, think it over and boost for it.

Y. M. C. A. PLAY FESTIVAL

Murray School Wins First Place With Maple Grove a Close Second.

The Murray school carried off the honors in the Haynes township Y. M. C. A. Play Festival held at Bay Shore on Tuesday of this week and the Maple Grove School landed in second place. The work of both the boys and girls showed a marked improvement over the previous two years work and more individual prizes were awarded than ever before. Quite a crowd of adults from the various districts were out to evidence their interest in the event.

Penney Rat Bill a Law.

The Penney rat bill, providing a five-cent bounty on rats has become a law, and county treasurers will be empowered to pay that amount for each rat head brought to him for bounty. The law is similar to the present statute providing for a bounty on English sparrows. The measure, when first introduced, was taken in the light of a joke, but when it was explained that the measure was aimed for the preservation of public health, citing cases where rats carried disease, and calling attention to the amount of grain and merchandise destroyed each year, the legislature took the bill seriously, with the result that it has now passed both houses.

Shortly before quitting time Monday night, Thomas Bacot, who was in the employ of Contractor Parmelee, engaged in putting the steel work on the south bridge approach, met with an accident which resulted in a badly broken thumb. Bacot was holding an iron drill while another employe was striking it with a heavy maul. In some manner the man using the maul missed the drill and struck Bacot on the hand, breaking his thumb and badly bruising the hand.

Courier Will Publish Weekly Weather Forecast

Will Be of Great Help to Farmers and Shippers—Report Received
Every Wednesday Morning.

A new weekly weather forecast designed especially to aid farmers in planning their farm operations and shippers of perishable products, to handle their goods with reference to expected weather conditions, was inaugurated by the United States Weather Bureau April 20 and will be continued during the crop season. In order to have these weekly forecasts reach the farmers and shippers in small towns with the least possible delay, the bureau also has arranged a system whereby the forecast will be taken Tuesday and reach the weekly newspapers, especially in the corn, wheat and cotton districts, by mail on Wednesday morning, which will be in time for the greatest number of them to use the information in their editions. In this way it is believed that the forecast for the week, commencing Wednesday morning, will be in the hands of most of the farmers and shippers in the small towns, through the medium of the weekly newspapers on Wednesday night, Thursday or Friday, thus giving them the benefit of from six to four days of advance forecast.

The forecasts will be prepared at Washington on Tuesday morning and will cover the week commencing Wednesday. They will be telegraphed to the state distributing centers of the weather bureau where they will be immediately printed and put in the mails to reach the weekly newspapers in the territory of each station early Wednesday, or in time for insertion by the vast majority of them. These forecasts will be ready for mailing from the distributing centers by 3 or 4 p. m. each Tuesday.

The daily papers which take press association services will secure the forecast by wire through the several press associations, which have volunteered to co-operate in its distribution.

The weather report above referred to will be published in the Courier, beginning Wednesday, April 28, and will be continued as long as they are sent out by the government. We are of the opinion that it will be a great help to the people of this vicinity. Watch for it each week.

Arbor and Bird Day Proclamation

By the Governor.

THE half has not been told concerning the destruction of insects by birds. The farmer in particular is indebted to the birds. True, there are birds whose reputations are not above reproach. Some of them eat a few cherries and berries. This is only a small compensation for the service they render man.

Throughout the civilized world, birds are objects of admiration. Their beautiful plumage, their sweet and cheering songs, awaken the noblest emotions. The man, woman or child who has the heart to needlessly harm a bird will do injury to the human family. Thousands of our most beautiful feathered songsters are killed annually by the domestic cat. We need fewer cats and more birds.

By training boys and girls to feed the birds in winter and house them against storms, we stimulate the nobler emotions. The killing of birds for sport brutalizes the hunter. Michigan should conserve bird life. This is distinctively human.

Many of the birds are like men, dependent upon the existence of trees. A park without trees is a desert, unfit for birds or human beings. Farms without trees, school yards without trees, homes without here and there a tree, roadsides without trees, are desolate and unfriendly. Plant a tree.

Let me ask the boys and girls to conserve the life of our wild flowers. Pick only a few here and there. Leave enough for seed.

Let the country, as well as the city, engage in systematic tree planting, in tree culture for the delight and benefit of all useful forms of life.

Therefore, I, Woodbridge N. Ferris, Governor of the State of Michigan, do hereby designate Friday, May 7th, 1915, as Arbor and Bird Day, and do request that this day be observed by all schools, public and private, and other educational institutions by the planting of trees for beautifying school grounds and parks, and by conducting suitable exercises for promoting the spirit of protection to trees and birds.

WOODBRIDGE N. FERRIS,

By the Governor: COLEMAN C. VAUGHAN, Secretary of State.

C. H. S. LOSE FIRST GAME

Loose Playing and Costly Errors Throughout Entire Game.

Play East Jordan H. S. Neal Saturday—Hard Practice This Week May Improve Playing.

After premeditating over the key for fifteen minutes, we now begin to relate the particulars concerning the slaughter that occurred on South Side Field last Saturday, when Boyne City took the local hopefuls into camp in such an overwhelming fashion that no one had the slightest cause to make an objection, at least about the score.

The real excitement began in the seventh frame for the East Arm men. Up to that time the game had all the earmarks of a fast contest, with a possible chance of the locals crowding in a couple on an even break of luck. An error by Mascho, followed by another by See and Hamlin, and three healthy clouts, also a wild pitch, etc., caused six tallies to cross the rubber and slip the game on the shelf for the visitors.

In the ninth Boyne City finished with three more completions of the circuit, which can be laid to a hit, base on balls and another "juggle stunt" by Mascho. See for Charlevoix had practically everything on the ball until the fatal seventh. Then he weakened and Boyne clouted out four clean hits that brought in the runs. Outside that he kept the hits well scattered and with a fair calibre of support the outcome would have been different. Of the possible 27 put-outs, See struck out 18. Kuhns, the visitors' hurler, struck out 14, but was given the best of support, only one error being committed and this with the bases empty.

Charlevoix threw away her chance to score and possibly tie the affair in the last of the sixth. Hamlin went to first on balls and was placed on second by a single by Mascho. With two on and no one down, Hamlin attempted to steal third and was caught easily by a clean peg by Catcher Aldred. The next two men each took three swings and the side was retired.

Even facing a better pitcher, Boyne City was easily superior to the locals with the stick. Charlevoix got two weazen hits. Both occurred after two out and the bases empty.

NINETY-FOUR DEL- EGATES PRESENT

At Second Annual Older Boys' Conference Held Last Friday.

One Hundred Sixty-One Plates Laid at Banquet Table—Speakers at Their Best.

Navigation was open, the weather could not have been improved upon, the speakers fitted into the plan as though they were made for that one purpose, and the ninety-four delegates, representing thirteen different communities, were there with the proper spirit to make the Second Annual Older Boys' conference, held at East Jordan last Friday, a success.

The first delegates to arrive and register were two lads who walked better than nine miles to be on hand for this Y. M. C. A. event. Following their arrival the registration committee was busy providing for the others who were coming, and at 4:30 the first session of the conference was called to order by Charles Mascho, president of the first annual conference.

At this session conference business was transacted, officers elected, and Geo. D. Westerman addressed the fellows on "Why We're Here." The conference banquet was scheduled for 6:30, and without any intention of shattering a precedent, the 161 banqueters were seated about the tables within twenty minutes of the time set. First the several delegations gave their yells which caused the older men attending the banquet to remember the days when Indians were abroad in the land. Following this demonstration of enthusiasm, Charles Murphy asked the blessing and the ladies of the East Jordan Presbyterian church served a particularly delightful and satisfying banquet. While busy with the good things served by the ladies, the Metropole orchestra added pleasure to the occasion by numerous fine numbers.

After the feasting was at an end, J. H. Milford introduced the speakers. Charles Danto made a hit that was good for the entire circuit with his address of welcome. It gave evidence of natural ability and careful preparation. When Russell Mater stepped up to give the response to the address of welcome, it was evident that he had his batting eye wide open. No one would have guessed that this was his first season at that position.

Charlevoix in Readiness For Banner Season

Expected That Coming Resort Season Will Be Heaviest in Years—Facilities Greatly Increased.

Two months more of waiting and Charlevoix will again be in the grip of the summer resort season. Already we are beginning to see the effects of those who have been more zealous than others and have got the "bug" earlier. The city is being scrubbed and scoured from cellar to garret, yards raked, houses receiving perhaps that much-needed coat of paint, until as we casually glance around, anticipating what the summer is going to bring forth, we are almost stirred to the realization that we are already in the midst of it. The noise and bustle and the warm and beautiful weather bespeak of nothing more like summer.

Rumor has it that the coming resort season will be the heaviest in years, not only for this city, but for every resort place in this part of the state, and also in the country. Over 500,000 rich folks, it is estimated authentically, will have

YOUNG PEOPLE HAPPILY WED

Mildred E. Johnson and Charles H. Lamphear Married Wednesday.

Both Prominent and Highly Respected Members of Younger Set—At Home to Friends.

One of the prettiest weddings of the early spring season was solemnized at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Elmer L. Johnson, 209 Mason street, last Wednesday afternoon, when their daughter, Mildred E., became the wife of Charles H. Lamphear. Rev. C. E. Taggart of the First Presbyterian church officiated at the nuptial ceremony, which was witnessed only by the relatives of the bride and groom.

Both Mr. and Mrs. Lamphear are members of the younger set of Charlevoix, and have made their homes here all their lives. Mr. Lamphear is the proprietor of the Charlevoix Ice Cream Co. They will reside at 209 Mason street for the present.

At exactly 1 o'clock, to the beautiful strains of Mendelssohn's wedding march, played by Miss Flossie Dutcher of Fairgrove, Mich., the bride and groom took their places in the very simply but prettily decorated parlor and the services repeated that tied the nuptial knot. The bride was beautifully dressed in a gown of light green silk, trimmed with rose embroidered lace, and carried a large cluster of white roses. Mr. Lamphear was dressed appropriate to the occasion and the time of the ceremony. Neither parties were attended.

Immediately following the ceremony, from 2 until 4 o'clock, a reception was held, when Mr. and Mrs. Lamphear received their many friends from the city and surrounding country.

Refreshments were served by the Misses Merle Felts, Lillian Emery, Zona Adams, Annette Nordrum and Mrs. Will Scroggie, all close friends of the bride.

During the hours of the reception, both vocal and instrumental music was furnished by Miss Zelma Worden, pianist of Petoskey; Miss Josephine Martin, violinist of Petoskey; Miss Irene Finucan, Miss Benona Bartlett and Mr. Frank Poole of the city.

Mr. and Mrs. Lamphear received many useful and beautiful remembrances, which alone are tokens of the high esteem of which they are regarded in the city.

Treasurers Are Liable.

The supreme court has rendered a decision which will be of interest to county treasurers. The case in question came before the court from Chippewa county where the county treasurer accepted checks aggregating $4,000 in payment of taxes, knowing there were no funds to meet them. He marked the taxes paid, holding the checks until there should be sufficient funds, and this never happened. The court holds that the treasurer and his bondsmen are liable for the amount.

FOR THE HOUSEWIFE.

How to Make a Homemade Fireless Cooker.

The cooker in question was designed by a young housewife and was made by her husband under her supervision. It is a compact box about thirty inches long by fifteen wide and fifteen deep. The cover, instead of fitting over the top, fits just inside, and it is fastened in place, when the box is closed, by two wooden buttons set out to the edge of the box by screws.

The box is lined on the inside with asbestos board, which is neatly tacked in. Two fifteen-inch squares of the same asbestos material divide the interior into three chambers or compartments of equal width. The round openings or "nests" into which the cooking utensils are made to fit are made by rolling pieces of asbestos into cylinder shape and fastening them together with a wire.

These round nests vary slightly in diameter, the smallest being six inches and the largest seven inches. The spaces between these nests and the sides of the compartments are filled with sawdust, which is packed closely.

A large sheet of asbestos, cut to exactly fit over the top of the box, has three round openings for the three nests. This piece is tacked firmly in place and presents a very neat appearance. It fits close in at the top of the box, so that when the cover is shut down there is no space between.

There are three small squares of the asbestos which are for covering over the nest openings when food is set in them to be cooked.

Two of the cooking vessels used to this homemade cooker are five pound lard pails, which have tight fitting covers. The third is a larger can, also of tin. The pails have wire handles and the large can has a small wire ring in the cover, by means of which it can be lifted. The smaller cans are designed for cooking cereals, puddings and vegetables and for baking round loaves of bread, while the large can is designed for cooking meats.

The feature of this cooker, which distinguishes it from most homemade articles, is that it has soapstone and iron plates, which can be heated so that roasting and baking can be done in the cooker. There are two soapstone plates, roughly cut, it is true, but they answer the purpose for which they are intended. They are made from a soapstone warmer, this having been cut in halves and the corners of each half sawed off, so that the soapstones have a hexagonal shape. The two iron plates are small, round stove covers.

The owner of this ingenious cooker declares that it is entirely practical and serviceable. By heating the two soapstones and placing one at the bottom of a nest and the other on top of the cooking vessel, after the food has been put inside and the cover put on, she can bake bread or roast meat. In doing the roasting, however, she browns the meat in a frying pan before putting it into the cooker.

In cooking breakfast cereal (which is put in the cooker the night before) and in boiling vegetables neither soapstones nor iron plates are used.

This cooker, which cost about $1.50, is expected to take the place of a range oven for its owner. She has a two-burner alcohol stove, on which steaks and chops will be cooked and over which the soapstones and iron plates are heated. At night some water is heated over the alcohol stove to put into the "fireless" and kept warm for toilet use in the morning. The cereal also is brought to a boil and then set into the cooker. In the morning there is no building of fires necessary. The cereal is ready for the table and coffee can be made and eggs or fish cooked in a few minutes over the alcohol stove. While breakfast is being eaten the dishwasher is heating.

After breakfast a fireside or stew or braise is made ready for the cooker and set into it to cook for the midday meal. This does away with excessive heat in the kitchen, and the clever woman who contrived the cooker declares that it has already proved to be worth much more than the small amount of money it cost.

INGREDIENTS OF FERTILIZERS

Three Elements That Afford an Increased Crop Yield.

Present agricultural practice prescribes the use of three chemical elements as a "soil amendment," a "stimulant for plant growth" or a "plant food," as it is variously put. These three elements when applied to the soil in which a crop is growing have been found by practice to afford an increased crop yield. They are phosphorus, potassium and nitrogen, spoken of by the trade terms of "phosphoric acid, potash and 'ammunites'." The nation's supply of these three common ingredients of fertilizer may be summarized as follows: Of phosphoric acid there is an abundant supply in the large deposits of phosphate rock in Florida and Tennessee and the enormous deposits of Idaho, Montana and Wyoming.

THE EUROPEAN WAR IN BIBLE PROPHECY.

To the entire world the war has come as a complete surprise because they have not read our book (600 pages—cloth) telling that just such conditions would exist, only to be followed by the still greater devastation of anarchy. The first edition came from the press in 1897.

Of potash, now obtained exclusively from the German mines, there is little known in this country outside of the desiccated residues in So. Lake, California, and the giant heaps of the Pacific littoral. In the latter there is much more than enough to supply the present demands of the fertilizer trade of the United States, the present annual consumption of potash being about 1,250,000 tons of varied composition. At present the helps are not supplying any of this, since it has not been determined by actual experimentation on a commercial scale that they can be used economically as a source of potash.

Of "ammunites" there is a large source in the ammonia produced as a byproduct in the distillation of coal for the production of gas or coke in both. This source is but partially developed, as by the methods most commonly practiced in this country this possible byproduct is not recovered. The amount of ammonia now going to waste is almost large enough to supply all of the "ammunites" now demanded by the fertilizer trade. The ammonia supply a large amount of nitrogen and dried blood of high fertilizer value, but of these possible byproducts there is still an enormous loss through the lack of organization and co-operation in the small scale slaughter of animals for food.

New Bean Resists Blight.

A new variety of beans has been developed at the Michigan Agricultural college that will resist blight and out yield other varieties. During the past three years the mild-blight beans have averaged thirty-five bushels per acre in the college variety tests, in which were included many of the high yielding Michigan varieties, such as Cook's, Boston, Landis, Sully's, Shoemith and a number of others. In each case the best yields of the other types made only an average of twenty-five bushels per acre.

The new bean originated in a single seed planted in 1908 and has been tested under heavy disease conditions. It is the only bean that resisted the disease conditions enough to be fully ripe and to drop its leaves by bean pulling time in 1914. However, this bean is not disease free, and there is a sharp distinction between disease resistance and freedom from disease. The anti-blight bean, as it is called, is one that will fill its pods and mature a crop in spite of disease conditions.

ZUDORA In the Twenty Million Dollar Mystery

By HAROLD MACGRATH

Copyright, 1914 and 1915, by Harold MacGrath

SYNOPSIS.

Zudora is left an orphan at an early age. Her father is killed in a gold mine. Zudora and the fortune from the mine, which grows to be worth $20,000,000, are left in the guardianship of Frank Keene. Zudora's mother's brother, who has set himself up as a Hindu mystic and is known as Hassam Ali. He decides that Zudora must die before she can have a chance to come into possession of her money, so that it may be left to him, the next of kin. Hassam Ali sees no obstacle to his scheme in the person of John Storm, a young lawyer, for whom Zudora has taken a fancy, and he commands the girl to put the man out of her mind. Zudora insists that if she cannot marry Storm she will marry no one.

"Well, well," says Hassam Ali, "solve my next twenty cases and you can marry him; fail in a single case and you must renounce him."

Zudora unravels a mystery and wins her first case—a case in which John Storm is saved from being convicted of a murder instigated by Hassam Ali himself.

Zudora and Hassam Ali visit Nabok Shan's house, where alien overcomes every one whenever Nabok attempts to marry a princess. Storm, seeking Zudora, is made a prisoner. Zudora follows Nabok Shan, restores the princess to her original lover and saves Storm from death.

A maker of diamonds tells Hassam Ali his secret. Storm informs Zudora that his life is being attempted frequently. Storm suspects Hassam Ali. Storm is arrested for stealing the diamond maker's gems, but Zudora discovers the real thieves—a pair of mice.

The newly help employed on Storm's father's farm are fleeing because a giant skeleton hand appears at night upon a hill near by. Storm is baffled in his investigation, but Zudora learns that her uncle has employed Jimmy Bolton, a half-witted man, thus to annoy Storm's parents. Zudora finds Bolton operating a big magic lantern and is attacked by him. Storm appears and saves her.

Hassam Ali asks Zudora to find a gem lost by two mysterious old men. Zudora gets a photograph of the gem and it burns in her hand. An old house is owned by Hassam Ali and the old men. Storm and Zudora are lured there and narrowly escape destruction when the house blows up. John McWalter, endeavoring to trap and kill George Smith, is killed himself, and Smith is charged with murder. Hassam Ali conspires to have John Storm meet the same fate as McWalter, and he and Storm are overcome by powerful forces. Zudora saves them, proves that McWalter's own dog trapped and killed him and saves Smith from a ban of lynchers.

An inventor blows up a submarine with a powerful heat ray which he sends through water. Hassam Ali sends Zudora to a photographer directly beneath the inventor's laboratory and orders the inventor to kill her. Zudora gets a warning, and her life is saved. The heat ray machine is destroyed, and the photographer, after a quarrel with Hassam Ali, is found dead in the river.

Wu Chang prevents Zudora's elopement with John Storm by hypnotizing her, and he and Hassam Ali attempt to snare her out of the country. This plot is frustrated by Storm.

Baird, Hassam Ali's double, falls in love with Zudora. Baird and Mrs. Du Val kidnap Zudora and the Van Wick child. Storm rescues them, and Hassam Ali dies.

With Hassam Ali dead Zudora is released of her pledge to solve twenty cases. She confronts, however, the greatest mystery of all, which is the mystery of her own life, and the ambition to secure the vast fortune of $20,000,000 left to her. This great photo serial is being shown in the lending moving picture theaters by the Thanhouser Film Corporation. Among those participating are Marcelle Snow, Mary Elizabeth Forbes, James Cruze, In the new role of reporter-hero, Sidney Bracey and Frank Farrington.

On looking through her uncle's papers Zudora finds that her father left her an interest in a diamond mine, and Storm and Baird both lend assistance in trying to regain for her possession of this estate which is being appropriated by rogues under the leadership of Mme. Du Val. They plan to frighten Zudora so that she will run away. Failing, they kidnap Zudora and Howard, the mine superintendent, and put them in a private insane asylum.

CHAPTER XIII.

A Raid on a Madhouse.

WHEN John Storm realized that Zudora was gone, abducted in her nightgown, with only a comfortable to shield her from the cold, he was stunned. And he had laughed at her for her forebodings, her talk about evil stars.

Who could have done it? Where could they have taken her? Were the diamond people back of it?

Was this move intended to frighten Zudora or really upke away with her? He was in a state of collapse and of half a mind to start out and just hunt for the woman he loved, having neither direction nor plan of action.

He only sensed the feeling that she needed him and that he must go to her. Then his gaze happened to fall to the floor, where it rested upon an envelope.

Absentmindedly he stooped and picked it up, but without glancing at the superscription.

They might be hurting her; she might be dead. By and by he saw the address.

Who was J. W. Bruce? Why he looked for the postmark—and became galvanized into life. Africa!

This envelope had been postmarked Africa. Hastily he drew out the contents and read it. It was signed by Henry Howard, the superintendent of the diamond mines.

In this letter Howard complained that he believed the rightful heir was being deprived of what was hers and that he demanded an understanding that would leave no further doubt in his mind.

And what a blow! Gentle Zudora, a prisoner of Storm alone knew where, subject to threats and possibly abuse! Oh, they should pay in blood! John swore as he pictured these things in his mind.

Mrs. Ramsey came in.

"What is it?" she asked, noting the wild anger in his face.

"It's the diamond business. They've taken the first trick."

"But they didn't take the diamonds," said Mrs. Ramsey, opening her hands. "They threw the flower pot to the floor, but did not look at the dirt. Where shall we put them? Wouldn't it be better if we deposited them at a bank?"

"We can't do that until we have established our right to them. I've got an idea. We'll hide them in the phonograph machine in one of the record files. It's the last place any one would look for them. Now, I'm off to see Hunt. You sleep in Zudora's room tonight. They may come back to have another look for the stones. If any one enters shoot. Don't feel any qualms. Shoot and shoot to kill."

He Was in a State of Collapse.

"I may not shoot straight, but I'll shoot."

When Storm entered Hunt's office he found that individual calmly fling away at a key. He paid no attention to Storm until he had notched the key to his satisfaction.

"Well?"

"Zudora's been abducted!"

"I thought maybe she would be."

"And you made no effort to prevent it?"

"My boy, could I tell just where they'd start the game? Howard is also missing. They're no fools we are dealing with. At the start they get the real owner of the mine and the superintendent. Now, what's that you've got in your hand?"

"A letter I found on the floor in Zudora's room. Moreover, it's addressed to J. W. Bruce and signed Henry Howard."

"Ha! That's something like it. So Bruce himself was mixed up in it, eh? Must feel the pinch to take a risk like this."

Hunt read the letter.

"H'm! This man Howard seems to be a white man. He probably larked when he landed and they're boxed him up somewhere. And I shouldn't be surprised if Zudora was next door, just keep your hair on, John. They won't hurt her to any extent. They won't dare until they know they are safe. Cheer up, Storm. We'll unravel this. Do you know what I'm going to do?"

"Try it," said Mme. Du Val.

time we'll prow around for Zudora. Wherever they have put her you can take my word for it they'll be mighty cautious for a week or so in going in that direction. Now, I know what you want to do.

"You want me to go and arrest Bruce. No, thank you. I want our friend Bruce free to come and go as he pleases. Sooner or later he'll gain courage enough to go and see how the fair captive is unking out, and then we'll learn something."

"I know it's a tough job to have to sit still when the woman you love is in danger. But a single false move on our part might be fatal. These people are desperate. I've begun to get a glimmer of that fact."

"How long will we have to wait?"

"That's up in the air, my boy. You can't rush out and do the work in ten minutes. It may be weeks, even months. But in the end we'll come out on top. But I'm going to ask you on your oath not to make any move without consulting me. Promise?"

"I promise," said Storm reluctantly. "My business is catching crooks, just as your is sending them off, as the case may be. I look at this as a long game, to be played with the utmost care. Now we'll go and rout out Baird."

All the While Baird's Eyes Were at the Window.

We'll pay his expenses with a fat bonus, and he'll get a good Sunday special, as he calls them."

In Mme. Du Val's salon there was rather an animated scene.

It appeared that Zudora was not easily to be frightened by threats.

At the instigation of Dr. Munn two nurses had buffeted Zudora without success. The two women had seen tears form in the girl's eyes, but her lips had remained uncompromisingly firm.

Radcliffe suggested to his henchmen to use a little melodrama upon Zudora—threaten her with death by the knife.

"Try it," said Mme. Du Val. "If I know that girl she'll laugh in their faces."

"You never can tell when a spirit like that will break," said Radcliffe. "I'm for giving the idea a trial. As for Howard, let him rot where he is. I know that breed."

He accomplishes for more than threats. Have you ever been hungry and thirsty, with these things almost within reach?"

"We'll try that later."

This Man Wants a Majestic Range

Dear Sir:

Send me the price list of the Majestic Ranges and the name of the firm who handles them in Charlevoix county.

I moved to Charlevoix the first of March and bought a cast range from Montgomery Ward.

But the range is not very satisfactory so I will have to dispose of it to someone, and would like to get a Majestic.

Hoping to hear from you soon, I remain,

Respectfully yours,

AXEL TULANE.

Charlevoix, R. F. D. No. 3.

This man, along with hundreds of others has come to the conclusion that mail order ranges are no good, and pledges his faith in the Majestic. He knew the Majestic, and for this reason, wants to buy another. This is the sentiment expressed by 99 out of a hundred Majestic users. It is the stove that gives universal satisfaction, and the one you should buy when replacing the old, worn out range you are now using. Call at our store and see them.

"We haven't got the gems yet," said Madame wisely.

"Africa?" cried Baird when Hunt outlined his plans. "That's a long way from home. A ten weeks' job at the least."

"It's a necessary job, my boy. Fifty a week and all your expenses and if everything turns out all right a handsome bonus. And think of the story you'll be able to put over!"

"I'll go. When do I start?"

"Tomorrow at noon. Liverpool. You'll be there one day; then you sail for Cape Town. Fast boat. A week or ten days will be sufficient to cover the work. Then like home."

"Tomorrow? Wow! You're the little speed king, Hunt. All right. I'll be at the dock tomorrow noon. You bring along the tickets and money. No time for any letter of credit. I've always wanted to go to Africa, anyhow."

"That's the kind of talk. Facts; get facts. Storm here will furnish you with papers of authority. You will get them fixed up through the American consulate. Now, you, Storm, take a photograph of Zudora to police headquarters. Not that I expect anything from that quarter, but they'll come in handy when we play the grand slam. I'm going to take a look at our friend Bruce."

On the following day Baird sailed again, and Storm and Hunt settled down to the grim business of watching two men.

But these two men seemed danger. They never went near the sanitarium.

THERE must be a whole lot of physical and mental suffering endured by the man who is forever dissatisfied with existing conditions. It must certainly be difficult to get any enjoyment out of a life where everything appears to be upside down and the reason for this reversed condition is attributed directly to the individual himself who is out of tune with the world. You will find this condition existing where the man has no business duties to attend to—hardly enough to take him out-of-doors twice a day. Usually he spends his time watching his neighbors and criticizing their actions and what they are doing. He lives and idle life, spends his time lounging around, and is of no practical good to the community in which he lives. A ray of optimism now and then has the same effect upon the human being that sunshine has upon the growing crops. It furnishes the food for both mental and spiritual growth.

If you are in public life—and a question comes up on which you have a deciding or even official voice, your constituents expect you to be on one side or the other. On most questions there is room for honest difference of opinion. If the public officer by honest conviction is on one side of the question upon which there is room for honest difference of opinion, even more men who disagree with him, provided they are reasoning beings, will give him credit for his position. When a public official tries to straddle he deceives no man and earns for himself the censure which he is always sure to get. It always pays to be a man or a mouse or a long tailed rat. You can't be all three.

INDICATIONS are that the resort season will open earlier this season than usual. The advance guard has already arrived and more will be following every day. With predictions of a hot, dry summer, people in the cities are laying plans to get away from the busy centers into the quiet and cool of the northern Michigan resorts.

THE interest taken by John D. Rockefeller in animal diseases is entirely non-partisan and offers no hope of precise information as to what is the matter with the democratic donkey.

Not merely do the women seem to relish house cleaning, but they claim they can see a difference in the appearance of the rooms after the furniture is all put back.

It is possible for a young man to win the admiration of the populace if he doesn't turn up his trousers far enough to show 15 inches of stocking.

One of our teachers in relating some of the experiences with her little tots, tells this: Now the rules of the school require, when a child reports illness in the family, that the teacher shall find out whether such illness is contagious or not, and it is customary to send the child home for a statement of facts. The other morning one of the younger boys reported his mamma was sick. He was sent home to find out the nature of the illness, and soon returned with the information: "Mamma say it ain't catching." "That won't do," replied the teacher. "You must go home and find out and then come and tell me just what is the matter with your mamma." Pretty soon the boy came toddling back into the room. "Teacher," said he, "mamma says it's all right. She says it's a boy and ain't catching."

The census taker rapped at the door of the little farm house and opened his long book. A plump girl of about 18 summers came to the door and blinked at him stupidly. "How many people live here?" he began. "Nobody lives here. We are only staying thru the hop season." "How many of you are here then?" "I'm here. Father's in the woodshed, and Bill is—" "See here, my girl, I want to know how many inmates there are in this house. How many people slept here last night?" "Nobody slept here, sir. I had the toothache dreadful, and my little brother had the stomach-ache, and the new hand that's helping us got sunburned so on his back that he has blisters the size of eggs; and we all took on so that nobody slept a wink all night long."

A physician one day on opening the door of his consultation room, said: "Next patient, please. Who has been waiting the longest?" A tailor who had called to present his bill rose and said: "I have, Doctor; I delivered your clothes to you three years ago, and I think it's my turn next." We hope he got it and the money.

FARMERS ARE ORGANIZING

Idea of Co-operation Taking a Strong Hold in Northern Michigan.

The idea of co-operative activity is taking a strong hold on the producers of farm wealth in Northwestern Michigan. Not only are exchanges and sub-exchanges being formed but the Gleaners, Arbers, the farmers clubs, and the granges are giving more attention than formerly to the different phases of the co-operative movement. In some cases committees are being appointed to arrange for co-operative buying, in other cases machinery which has been in existence for years is being oiled and put in working order. This is the case with the Grange which has an elaborate buying system. The Gleaner organization has a selling system with a clearing house in Detroit, and warehouses scattered throughout the producing region. This machinery has helped many a farmer to market his produce. This spring there is more life than usual among the Gleaner marketing associations. The old organizations are becoming more active and new associations are being formed. All these are good symptoms. They indicate that the farmers and fruit growers are becoming alert to their own welfare and are making efforts to better their lot in a financial way. Without question great things can be accomplished when the many work to a common end which in this case is industrial co-operation.

The delegation yells, mentioned as coming at the beginning of the banquet, transported the next speaker back to the Michigan campus scenes and when he was introduced to speak on the subject, "What a Business Man expects of a Boy," he found it necessary to lead the locomotive yell before he could get his voice in shape for a speech. R. O. Bisbee, cashier of the Peoples' State Bank of East Jordan, certainly gave the delegates some profitable advice and evidenced the fact that a college man seldom grows old.

The concluding number on the program left in the minds of one hundred and sixty-one men and boys the thought which the Young Men's Christian Association aims to emphasize, namely, that a Christian life to be worth while must be a growing life and continually and positively on the side of righteousness. Gerrit Masselink of Ferris Institute was at his best when discussing the subject, "Is Christianity Worth While?"

Saturday morning the delegates assembled at 9 o'clock and listened to papers by delegates, in which they discussed things vital to the welfare of Charlevoix county fellows. Following the papers, Mr. Westerman led a vigorous and helpful discussion and then the conference photo was taken.

The afternoon session opened at the Temple theatre, where the boys were privileged to see pictures of the Saginaw and Ann Arbor State Boys' Conferences and the State Camp at Torch Lake. Then they assembled at the Presbyterian church to listen to a stirring gospel message delivered by E. C. Miller of South Bend, Indiana. Following Mr. Miller's talk, twenty of the delegates acknowledged their intention to accept Christ as their king.

The ladies of the Baptist church will hold a rummage sale commencing Thursday, April 29th, till Saturday, May 1, inclusive, in the Geiken building, just south of Charlevoix Hotel.

The telephone saved them the trouble. Each day they knew just how Zudora had passed the day before. There was still no sign of weakening on her part. They dared not grow impatient. When they learned that the girl had tricked them regarding the hiding place of the diamonds they shifted their diet to bread and water twice a day.

They dared not go too far. As for Howard, the mine superintendent, they had set about to starve him gradually. They were not particular whether he died or not under the treatment.

Days passed, days became weeks. Storm and Hunt worked with extraordinary care, but the hiding place the rogues had selected for Zudora was not to be found.

Hunt had not seen Bruce, the smuggler, in a long time. Upon investigation he learned that Bruce had also gone to Africa.

Would he recognize Baird if they ran across each other? Whatever happened Baird had the advantage of being first on the spot.

Meanwhile Baird arrived at the mines, and after his documents were shown was given the run of the office. It was all very novel and interesting to the late understudy to Hassam All.

He had always loved color. So he donned the habiliments of a boss miner, and when his books were made up he spent the balance of his time in the mines to see how it was done. One day he saw what is rarely given man to see, the finding of a big stone, the kind bankrupt empires and tottering kingdoms seem unable to do without.

It was as big as a hickory nut and worth twenty thousand in its uncut state. Baird was permitted to hold the stone, and to his eyes it did not seem possible that this dull crystal was of that precious type which sparkled and scintillated around women's throats and fingers.

Then came Bruce, and Baird recognized him at once. What was he doing here in the office?

Bruce was, in fact, going over the same books that he had already gone over.

The clerk was a good chap. Evidently he was not divulging Baird's presence to Bruce.

When the latter heard of the big stone he called Radcliffe the news. And Baird called Hunt that Bruce had it.

Legally the gem had to be turned over to Bruce. All Baird's papers called for was the right to look over the company books.

So Bruce pocketed the stone, already finding in his mind a future purchaser. Some one was going to buy an unregistered stone for about $15,000 less than he would pay, supposing the stone came through the regular channels of trade.

That night Bruce went to the trouble of hiding the find. All the while Baird's eyes were at the window.

In other words, the smuggler was in danger of being smugged. Baird, having ascertained the exact hiding place of the precious lump of crystal, got into his traveling clothes, packed his cases, got a horse and carriage to carry him to the nearest railroad, then waited until Bruce fell asleep, which was soon, having been generous with whisky "pegs" that night.

Baird knew all about raising windmills; he had been taught in an expert school.

He entered Bruce's room, took the diamond from his hiding place and stashed it against a chair.

Bruce awoke. He saw the dim form and plunged toward it courageously.

Baird ducked and leaped out the window. A bullet sang past his ears.

He stowed away his "stolen goods" in the left side pocket of his trousers, climbed aboard the carriage and made the kaffir to drive "like blazes" for the station.

Two days later Bruce booked for home on the same boat with Baird, who passed him on the promenade, sat near him in the dining saloon, exchanged ideas about the weather in the smoke room, and Bruce hadn't the slightest suspicion that this pleasant stranger had "done him up brown."

Before the final landing the two became quite chummy. And every night when he retired to his bunk Baird let go his chuckles. It was as good as a plug.

On the other hand, Bruce never dropped the least word regarding his affairs.

And whisky and champagne acted as a clamp to his lips. It would all make a corking good special for the Sunday edition.

And now to smuggle the gem in himself.

He kept it in his pocket until his cases were examined, then with a bit of legerdemain slipped the stone into one of the cases.

And Bruce saw this play. And he saw many other things when Hunt and John Storm came up to greet Baird.

In the excitement of the meeting Baird stepped away from his belongings, and Bruce quickly appropriated the suit case.

It was the end of the suit case disappearing into a taxi that caught Baird's eye. Then he understood that he had been outplayed through a bit of carelessness.

The Mine Superintendent Was Beyond Help.

Bruce's taxi whirled away.

Baird and Storm and Hunt piled into the next taxi and gave chase.

Bruce had a scheme. If he could have succeeded in putting it over it would have been a brilliant scheme.

To lure the three into the pleasant confines of Dr. Munn's sanitarium for the insane!

Once there they would leave only feet foremost—dead.

He reached the sanitarium. The pursuing taxi was but three minutes behind.

Bruce roused the men in the office, explaining hurriedly what was going to happen.

Baird was first at the door. The attendant put up a light.

Then the doctor and another attendant hove in sight, and Baird was used roughly.

It is quite possible that he might have gone out feet foremost had not Hunt and Storm burst through a window which was not barred. A fine shindy followed, and presently Storm and Hunt had the affair in their hands.

From somewhere above came a piercing cry.

"A fake insane asylum, I'll bet you!" cried Hunt. "Come on! There goes the cry again."

They heard the sputter of a motor-truck flying back to town again—but they gave it no attention. "Fisables" they ran.

"Help, help!"

"That voice!" murmured Storm, his heart threatening to leap from his breast.

They came to the door, smashed it in, and a pale, wan, hungry girl collapsed as Storm's arms flew around her.

Hunt found Henry Howard, but the mine superintendent was beyond help. They had really starved him to death, and he died in Hunt's arms while vainly trying to tell his story.

The end was not in sight yet. [TO BE CONTINUED.]

The Prince and the Bell.

When Edward VII. of England was Prince of Wales he was in Philadelphia in 1893, and he took great interest in the relics of the Revolutionary period, although his visit to Independence Hall was predicted purely in a spirit of amusement by his entertainers.

In rummaging the old cracked bell, which had been somewhat contemptuously hidden away, and this more than any other relic seemed to fascinate the prince, whose words have been thus reported:

being here, covered with this accumulated dirt, it should occupy the chief place in this hall of Independence. It is to you what the Magna-Charta is to England. It is cracked, but it is an inspiration. Believe me, my friends, it affects me more than anything I have been shown."

The good sense of this suggestion appended immediately to the pride and sensibility of the custodians of the relics, and from that moment the Liberty bell took its "chief place in the hall of Independence."

Host Weaves.

Heat waves, says Edwin C. Martin, author of "Our Own Weather," prove disastrous directly in proportion as hot nights are combined with hot days. For a number of days successively the heat may mount during the day to extraordinary heights, but if the intervening nights turn comparatively cool the number of prostrations and deaths will be much less than under a considerably lower temperature continuing with scant abatement through the day and night. Thus any situation that peculiarly favors cooling off at night has a clear advantage during the prevalence of a hot wave. It is also an advantage to be insured to heat. The same degree of it that would cause great suffering to the people of the north imposes nothing more than discomfort on the people of the south.

Uses For Seaweed.

The Japanese employ some 600,000 persons in the seaweed industries. These are mainly engaged in preparing edible products. China alone, it appears, consumes over $500,000 worth of gelatinous articles made from seaweed every year. Furthermore, the Japanese use seaweed in the manufacture of such diverse objects as policemen's boots, picture frames, marbled doors and electric switchboards. In France seaweed finds utility as a stiffener for mattresses and as size for straw hats, while the native fishermen of South Australia make ropes and fishing nets from the local varieties.

Name of Phoenix Park.

The origin of the name of Phoenix park, Dublin, has puzzled many scholars unacquainted with the Irish language. The name was culled in the Irish vernacular Phoinn-sighe, pronounced foin-sighe, which signifies clear or fair water, and which articulated in the brief English manner exactly resembled the word phoenix. The spring or well so called from which the park derives its name still exists close to the Dublin entrance of the vice regal lodge. It is situated in a glen beside the lower lake and is one of the romantic objects of the park.

Got No Autograph.

Mark Twain on one occasion sent a letter the substance of which was as follows:

"To ask a doctor or builder or sculptor for his autograph would be in no way rude. To ask one of these for a specimen of his work, however, is quite another thing, and the request might be justifiably refused. It would never be fair to ask a doctor for one of his corpses to remember him by."

There was no autograph to the letter, which was typewritten throughout.

Literary Realms.

"Where are you been, my dear?" "To my study club."

"And what did you discuss at your literary club?"

"Shakespeare and circular skirts, Emerson and perpendicular plumes, Browning and military collars. I think that's all."—Louisville Courier-Journal.

Farm and Garden

SOME HEN SUGGESTIONS.

Hints That Poultry Raisers May Profitably Bear in Mind.

[Prepared by United States department of agriculture.]

Allow the hens free range. Wire in the garden, not the hens.

Stronger fertility is secured from birds on range.

Remove the male birds from the flock as soon as the hatching season is over so as to produce infertile eggs.

Infertile eggs are produced by hens having no male birds with them.

Infertile eggs keep much better than those that are fertile.

The male bird has no influence on the number of eggs laid.

The hen's greatest profit producing period is the first and second years.

February and March are the best hatching months. Chicks hatched during these months are freer from sore head than those hatched later.

Do not allow setting hens to remain in the henhouse. By so doing many eggs are started to incubate, which renders them unfit for use at home or to market.

If possible place the brood coops near the cornfield, which furnishes both shade and fresh ground.

The free use of kerosene or crude petroleum on the roosts, dropping boards, in the cracks and around the nests will exterminate mites. White-wash is also good.

Spray the brood coops once a week with some of these solutions and move to fresh ground.

Be sure and feed the table scraps to the fowls. Milk is one of the best feeds for egg production. For additional information on poultry get in touch with your county agent and state agricultural college.

Write to the department of agriculture, Washington, D. C., for Farmers' Bulletins on poultry. They are free for the asking.

Annual Weeds.

As to the duration our weeds may be grouped into three classes—annuals, biennials and perennials. Annual weeds are those which produce seed and die the same season that they begin their growth. They come up anew each year from seed. Some of the most common annual agricultural weeds occurring in the west are pig-weeds, wild oats, ragweeds, goosefoot or lamb's quarters, shepherd's purse, foxtail grass, false flax, barnyard grass, squirrel tail grass, sweet clover, knot grass, wild grass, Russian thistle, crab grass and sow thistle.

The following suggestions are given for combating weeds of the annual class: In the case of a tilled crop and fallow land cultivate thoroughly just after the seed has germinated. On land badly infested with such weeds place a crop that can be given clean tillage, such as potatoes or beets. Under no circumstances allow the plants to go to seed. Clean cultivation is one of the best means of keeping the land free from weeds of all kinds.—W. W. Robbins, Colorado Station.

ORCHARD AND GARDEN.

A potted plant must have air about the roots and good drainage, as it would in the garden.

Rhubarb roots stored in the cellar may now be started into growth and will give good stalks in a few weeks.

Large beets may be put in moist soil near a sunny window and give a few crops of greens between now and spring.

Jardineres in which water is allowed to stand make good graves for house plants. Keep them free of water if you want healthy plants.

Look for scale and mealy bug on ferns and other house plants. To rid the plants of the insects wash with soap and water, using a soft sponge or brush; then cleanse with clear water. Rain water is better than well water, since it does not contain alkali, which often leaves white streaks on the leaves.

Watch the new house plants obtained at Christmas time. Remember they are from a greenhouse, in which the air is moist, so water frequently and thoroughly. A good way is to set the pot in a tin or pan and sprinkle the leaves. If it is a flowering plant be careful not to get water on the flowers.—Leroy Cady, University Farm, St. Paul.

Compassionate.

Small Mangle drew the picture of a dog and ate on her slate, and, calling her mother's attention to it, she said:

"Of course a cat ought to have four legs, but I drew this one with six so it could run away from the dog."

There is no question that the Ayrshire cow is rapidly coming to the front as an all round dairy cow. She has shown high form as a milk producer, both in quantity and quality. As an all around money maker on the farm she stands near the top. animals as to have a major portion of them come fresh when the most profit can be made.

There is a number of factors that must be considered. The breeder who has his business well in hand knows each individual animal and knows how to handle her to the best advantage. He always makes calculations for the future when breeding the heifers the first and second time, and very often careful and intelligent management here determines the future profit in a great measure.

The dairymen who would make a profit cannot afford to allow any part of his business to go a drifting. A much of the feed as is economical should be grown on the farm. The ration must be ample and economical. The breeding and handling of the young stock require skill and the most careful attention.

Alfalfa For Dairy Cattle.

Figures from a cow testing association in California indicate what may be expected of cows of dairy capacity when fed exclusively on green alfalfa alfalfa hay or a combination of the two. Of the 300 cows under test by the association, forty-four exceeded 325 pounds of butter fat per cow. The exclusive alfalfa ration is commonly used by those farmers whose herds are members of the testing association. The average production of butter fat for the total number of cows is 272.3 pounds per year. The average production with that of the average of the forty-four cows, speaks well for exclusive alfalfa feeding.

- Do not use a wide top pail.
- Do not allow milk to stand in the stable.

Things a dairyman should do:

- Avoid dust in the stable at milking time.
- Have clean hands and clothing while milking and handling milk.
- Thoroughly cleanse and scald all utensils and keep to clean place.

FALL FRESHENING COWS PAY BEST

Unless you have a special all the year around trade three-fourths of the cows should come fresh from August to November. Writes L. W. Lighty in the National Stockman. And even with such a trade it is often good business to have most of the cows come fresh in the autumn. During the summer a number of my best butter customers would spend most of their time at the seashore or in the mountains, and the demand for butter fell off nearly a third.

In the winter they were all at home and consumed a minimum quantity. With a few exceptions, we can make the most money by having most of our cows coming fresh in the fall of the year. Why is this not generally practiced? Because the majority of us prefer to allow things in general to drift rather than make them come our way. We pay little or no attention to this matter and soon the herd will be following the natural ancestral trait and freshen in the spring.

But we must always have absolute control of our business if it is to be a source of pleasure and profit. By intelligent management we can, in the course of a few years, so breed our

WHO IS RESPONSIBLE?

Judge Pinlock of North Dakota, pronouncing sentence upon a man condemned to spend the remainder of his natural life in the state penitentiary, made a scathing denunciation of the liquor traffic. The man had murdered his wife while under the influence of liquor procured across the river in Moorhead, Minn.

"I do not know, and under the present state of our law I never want to know," said the Judge, "who sold you the liquor under the influence of which you committed this unnatural crime. Let that man's conscience bring such remorse that his energizing power will never let go, until the largest possible reparation he made. Whoever he was, and wherever he may be at this and moment; whether his place at business is in the well-adorned and highly-decorated room where tempting wands appeal to the taste, where sweet music delights the ear and lulls to sleep the reasoning faculties; or whether it was in the lowest, dirtiest, man-abandoned, God-forsaken and death-dealing chancel house of despair, where only abides the thoughtless and sullen greed for gain, it matters not; before the bar of God, if not of man, he stands alike with you morally responsible for this horrible crime. The trouble is he is not here with you to receive a merited punishment.

"If your partner in this offense were here he would plead by way of defense that he did not 'by fraud, contrive or force' occasion your drunkenness—a plea which would have to be sustained. An enlightened and long-suffering public will some day, and that day very soon, also in the majesty of its power, and demand that the legislature strike out the words 'by fraud, contrivance or force' and 'for the purpose of causing him to commit any crime,' and boldly declare that he who in any manner sells intoxicating liquors to another, under the influence of which a crime, whether of murder or of some lesser offense is committed, is equally guilty as a principal in any such crime committed."

BREAD OR WHISKY?

"What shall we now plant, barley or poison and kill our citizens, our young mothers and the unborn, or wheat, to grow bone and brawn and blood and brains and bravery for Britain?" asks Dr. C. W. Saleeby, F. R. S. E., the noted English medical authority, in an article in the Daily Chronicle of Manchester, England. He deprecates the worse than waste in raising barley to make beer and whisky, and turning food material into poison. He quotes the words of the czar of Russia to his minister of finance, "It is not meet that the welfare of the exchequer should be dependent upon the ruin of the spiritual and productive energies of numbers of my loyal subjects," and urges his fellow-countrymen "in this epoch-year of 1915" to "plant wheat instead of whisky; bread instead of beer; life instead of death," adding that "never, perhaps, was there a more fateful choice for the English nation."

WHEN IS A MAN DRUNK?

Judicial authority in Topeka has ruled that a man is drunk if a policeman can detect the odor of liquor on his breath. If, in addition, he talks and laughs boisterously he is drunk and disorderly and guilty of a breach of the peace. If this standard were applied to the city of New York it is estimated that 750,000 people would be arrested as drunk and disorderly every day. In Chicago the number would be 400,000. In Philadelphia, 300,000. The claim of the liquorites that Topeka has a 'high percentage of drunkenness will not hold water—or any other kind of liquid.

In this connection it may be noted that Topeka, with a population of 47,102, has 29 policemen. The average for 20 American saloon-infested cities with a population of 43,000 to 49,000 is 46 policemen.

SALOON VS. MODERN BUSINESS.

"It isn't the crank who is putting the saloon out of business," remarks the Wichita Beacon. "It's the business man, the railroad man, the banker, the lawyer, the merchant, the alien who have to depend upon someone else for efficiency in the various departments of the important work and who have observed the killing effect of booze on the men who have to be responsible for important work."

"They are the men who are getting the goat of the distiller."

"The saloon is up against the modern business age. It is up against an enemy that it cannot throttle or buy or browbeat or bluff, and it might as well save what it can and go out of business."

PASSING OF "BLUE MONDAY."

"Blue Monday in the industries of Kokomo is a thing of the past," says J. E. Frederick of the Kokomo Steel and Iron company. Kokomo City is without saloons. "On Monday our factories are able to secure the same output as on any other day of the week. This was not the case when saloons were running."

Deafness is caused by an inflamed condition of the mucous lining of the Eustachian Tube. When this tube is inflamed, you have a running, itching, and watery ear, and when it is entirely closed deafness is the result, and unless the inflammation can be taken out and this tube restored to its normal condition hearing will be destroyed forever. HOW TO MAKE TIMOTHY SEED DECORATIONS.

Have you seen the funny little clay house, pigs and fierce looking men's heads with grotesque bristling corn timothy grass growing on their surface? A leading florist in one of our large cities is exhibiting these queer things, which have attracted much attention.

The florist, with blades of grass forming his curly hair, is real little. As for the pig, the green grass bristling over his entire body resembles the porcupine with his world-renowned quills. The fierce looking clay head is of a terrible, weird aspect with its green hair, eyebrows and mustache.

These little clay novelties can be had for 50 or 75 cents. Timothy seed is sprinkled on each piece. A hole in the top admits of water to be poured into the "vase" every day. It takes only two weeks' time for the tiny grass to appear, and then you have an interesting piece of indoor greenery.

These "plants" are particularly suitable for the nursery. The children will derive much amusement from watching the florist's man, the pig's skin or the man's hair turn green.

THE FAITH OF ONE PERSECUTED

1 Samuel 24.—May 8.

Saul's Jealousy of David—Attempts to Injure Him—Frequent Deliverances Superhuman—Satan, Our Great Enemy, Seeks Our Injury—Devotion to God and Righteousness Secures Us Deliverance—Why Such Experiences Are Permitted of God.

"Whoso putteth his trust in the Lord shall be safe."—Proverbs 22:25.

WITH the Philistines continuing, David was made a regular soldier, with command over a regiment and closely in touch with King Saul. Victory came wherever David was engaged, and King Saul saw the people's admiration turned from himself to David. The sentiment reached a climax when, on the return from a victory, the women came forth singing,

"Saul hath slain his thousands, But David his tens of thousands!"

Jealousy took full possession of the king, and thenceforth his one purpose seems to have been to destroy David. It was a secret withheld from him that David was already appointed to be his successor. He merely knew that Samuel the Prophet had told him that in consequence of his failure to carry out the Divine instructions regarding the Amalekites, the kingdom would be taken from him and his family and given to another.

Jealousy is the bitter fruit of selfishness. It unbalances reason, extinguishes happiness, and subjects its possessor to horrible Saul Throwing Javelins. It is the most terrible, and the most foolish, manifestation of selfishness. Every one recognizing it in himself should seek victory through vigilance and prayer.

Saul's Jealousy Was Crafty.

When under control of jealousy, King Saul is described as having an evil spirit from the Lord—more properly, an evil spirit opposite from the Lord's Spirit of kindness, justice, love. Sometimes David could soothe him by skillful playing on a harp; yet he knew the king's treacherous mood, and on two occasions hindered Saul from throwing at him a javelin.

Intent upon drawing him into a quarrel, the king provoked David by his elder daughter to wife, and then gave her to another. David, however, discreetly commented that he was neither of a sufficiently noble family nor financially able to expect such honors. Another trap was to betroth to him the king's younger daughter, Michal. David again told of his unworthiness and his lack of wealth, whereupon Saul stipulated that her dowry should be the evidence of the killing of a hundred Philistines. No doubt he hoped that David would lose his life; but instead, David killed twice the number and received Saul's daughter.

Finally the king told Jonathan and his courtiers that David must die. Jonathan's sentiment was as loving and brotherly as his father's was cruel. Jealous, selfish, it was Jonathan who would lose by David's attainment of the throne. Hence the love of Jonathan has become a proverb.

Jonathan interceded with his father for David. The plan was successful. David again became a member of the royal household, but only for a time. The king was not without noble sentiments, but they were not deep enough to control his life. He was under control of a selfish spirit, which is opposite from the Spirit of God.

Ere long, in a jealous fit the king threw his javelin with deadly aim; but David quickly dodged it. David went to his room; but a guard had been stationed there, instructed that upon coming forth he was to be killed. His wife assisted him to escape by letting him down out of a window.

Two Hundred Lives For a Wife.

Let us now inquire how David's course in killing two hundred human beings for a wife squares with the principles of justice, which the Bible everywhere inculcates. First, we must have in mind the difference between being a Jew under the Law Covenant and being a Christian under the New Covenant.

Second, we must remember that the Bible teaches that the penalty of sin is death—not torment after death; that this penalty was justly inflicted upon Father Adam because of his wilful sin; and that his finally die because the seeds of death are in us from our birth.

From this viewpoint, ours is a world of convicts under death-sentence. This accounts for God's permitting various death-dealing circumstances to control—famine, pestilences, cyclones, etc. When we come to see that the same God who justly condemned all through one man's disobedience has made provision for the justification of all through Christ's obedience unto death, we see things in a new light.

David must be judged by the Law under which his nation was placed at Mount Sinai. The Israelites were informed that the commandments had allowed their cup of iniquity to become to the full, and that "I will be even that entire land." David therefore was carrying out the Divine instruction.

Economy Hints

A penny saved is a penny earned.—Benjamin Franklin.

WHEN linen tablecloths are discarded because more durable would be impractical they may be turned into four napkins, towels and tray cloths. The four corners of a tablecloth seldom or never show any signs of wear, or tear, so that they may be cut into four napkins as large as may be desired, hemmed and taken for ordinary use.

When the napkins are cut out the remainder of the cloth forms a large sized Maltese cross, which can be turned into towels, two shorter and two longer. These will not be as strong and lasting as the napkins, yet they are well worth the hemming. If any part of the Maltese cross is too worn to make a towel, then the good parts may be cut to the size of the various trays in the house and trimmed around the edges with good lace which has been saved from expensive underwear.

Using the Designs.

Old damask tablecloths may have their usefulness extended. One housekeeper did it in the following way: She saw that the design was an ideal one for a picture holder, pillow cover, table cover and other things. She first made a picture frame, thinking that she would trace the damask design to the material, put it and work it the usual way, but she finally decided that it would be easier to work right over the damask, thus saving time, insuring accuracy and furnishing the padding at the same time.

So she dusted the damask design on a piece of light colored satin, covered the roses and leaves with the usual colors with the embroidery stitch, following the pattern as carefully as a stamped one.

When all the damask design was covered she cut off the exposed damask carefully. The satin then presented an exquisite wreath of roses standing out distinctly. As an experiment she made a tiny edge of buttonhole stitch around the entire outline, not catching up the satin. This would only be necessary when it is difficult to cut the damask as close as desired. The work was then mounted on a circular cardboard and the result was a handsome frame.

Transfer a damask pattern to almost any cushion material and you will have a dainty cushion and one that isn't the model of your neighbor's. There is no limit to the uses and combinations arising from this method. Never throw away tray cloths, napkins or tablecloths of damask no matter how much they are worn.

A UNIQUE CLOSET.

How to Make More Space For Hanging Clothing.

A clever closet arrangement made by a woman who found too little closet room in her small house is an idea well worth passing on. She had a cupboard put up a shelf eighteen inches wide by fifty-six inches long and six inches from the floor. On top he built three hutches, eighteen inches square, with drop fronts instead of covers and snap catch bolts to fasten them with. Under the shelf he put a wooden curtain pole halfway between the edge of the shelf and the wall and three inches from the shelf. The clever woman herself painted and enameled the shelf and boxes white, fastened a small brass rod around the shelf and made a curtain of dark blue denim, making a cut out applique border of the wrong side of the denim, which was pale blue, and buttonholing the edge with white. The curtain was quite full, and a few weights were put in the bottom hem to keep the folds in place.

She slipped her best gowns into well lined muslin bags, thus leaving the regular closet for everyday use. The hutchboxes obviated the necessity of having handboxes under the bed.

In the kitchen she had the carpenter build her a window box the width and length of the sill, six inches high and divided into three compartments with hinged covers. In two of these were kept her kitchen forks, knives and spoons and in the third small laundry necessities. This left the small table drawer for the towels. In the bottom of each hardware compartment was a small cotton flannel pad to keep the things from rattling and scratching.

How to Launder Fine Nets and Lace Curtains.

The best process for washing fine nets and lace curtains is to wash them in warm water, not too hot, and the best naphtha soap. To wash them in too hot water makes them tender and causes the threads to break. After washing out the dust in warm water soap them and allow them to stand for fifteen or twenty minutes. Then wash them by hand and always wring lace curtains carefully through the wringer, never by hand. That strains them and causes them to break in places. Rinse well in cold water, then stretch with warm steam. If this process does not whiten them enough, but do not fail them. This is the best way to wash fine curtains, especially ecru colored.

really accounts for the loss of the first and opening game of the local schedule. The fielding of Charlevoix was strangely peculiar,—at times going into the miraculous, and then in the pinches going into the bone-head class.

The real sensations of the game were few, but what did occur raised a couple of hairs. In the third inning Morton slammed one to deep right. Sloan plowing over the rocks of the outfield, made a clean catch and robbed the batter of the hardest hit of the game. Aldred got a home run in the fourth because Shapton couldn't tell the difference between the multitudinous species of stones covering the landscape in the garden. Indeed we can't blame Shapton, altogether, but it hurt to see the little fellow kick up the dust all the way around.

This being the first contest of the season, we offer a little apology, hoping to pick up before next Saturday, when the locals cross bats with East Jordan at the latter city. With a week's practice and the lessons of a complete drubbing to benefit by and a little determination to wipe that out, the result should be different.

Farm Home Burns.

The farm home of Robert E. Pearl, in Wilson township, was destroyed by fire April 18. The fire caught from an overheated stove pipe, and when discovered had made such headway that there was no chance of putting it out. The loss was in the neighborhood of $1,500, with insurance of $600.00.

DEATH COMES TO REV. C. N. COULTER

Had Been a Resident of Northern Michigan Since 1871.

Had Labored Faithfully and Will Be Greatly Missed—Interment at Central Lake.

The death of Rev. Cyrenus N. Coulter, one of the well known and revered pioneers of this section of the state, occurred at the state hospital at Traverse City, Sunday, May 2. He had been in very poor health for some time, and about the first of the year was taken to the hospital where he could have the best medical aid obtainable.

Mr. Coulter was a native of the good old Buckeye state, having been born in Richmond county, Ohio, on a farm eight miles southeast of the city of Mansfield, on the 15th of June, 1834. He passed his boyhood days on the old homestead farm on which he was born. Here he obtained such education as was afforded in the common schools of the locality, and later was a student in Franklin college at Athens, Ohio, going from there to the celebrated Oberlin college, being ordained a clergyman of the Congregational church in 1867.

In 1861 he came to Michigan, locating at Hartland, where he held a pastoral incumbency for three years, at the expiration of which, in 1871, he came to the northern part of the state and settled at Atwood, a Congregational society having been organized there three years previously. Of this pioneer church Mr. Coulter took pastoral charge, and also preached at intervals at Charlevoix, which was then a mere hamlet in the midst of the primeval forest. It was during this time that it was his portion to conduct the first funeral services held in Charlevoix, that of James Lester, who has since and whose remains were the first to be interred in Brookside cemetery.

Ever since this time Rev. Coulter continued to reside and faithfully labor in this section of the state, except for one and one-half years which he passed in the vicinity of Saginaw. For over thirty years he has been identified with pastoral work. For seven years he served the little church in Banks town-

Mothers' Day Proclamation.

By the Governor.

There is one word in the English language that commands the attention of the proud and humble, the great and the small, the virtuous and the depraved, the old and the young. That word is Mother. It appeals to the hearts of all men. In the year nineteen hundred fifteen, the mothers of Europe carry crushing burdens. The mothers of America sympathize with their sisters across the sea. The greatness of a nation depends upon the mothers of that nation. The mother is the guardian angel of childhood. Motherhood is the precious flower of womanhood. Upon its purity and vigor depend the welfare of the world.

Children need to be impressed with this everlasting truth. Read the tribute of Lincoln to his mother; read the tribute of Henry Grady to his mother; read the recent tribute of John Burroughs to his mother.

Fathers are great and noble in proportion as they are loyal to the mothers and in proportion as they guard and protect the mothers of the land.

Let the boys and the girls and the "grown-ups," who are away from home on Mother's Day, write a letter of gratitude to Mother. Let those who are at home meet mother with a smile, a kiss and a handful of flowers. Recite to her the prayer she taught you at the bedside.

THEREFORE, I, Woodbridge N. Ferris, ask that the people of Michigan set apart the second Sunday in May (the 9th) as Mother's Day. As far as possible, let parents in their homes and both young and old in public meetings discuss the theme of Mother with that enthusiasm and sincerity which should characterize all loyal Americans.

WOODBRIDGE N. FERRIS, Governor.

By the Governor:

COLEMAN C. VAUGHAN,
Secretary of State.

ship, Antrim county, and much of his work was of the true pioneer type, involving the holding of meetings in school houses and the supplying of little charges of the weaker sort, so that his labors were arduous and self-abnegating, and gained him a wide circle of friends throughout this section of the state.

In the year 1854 was solemnized the marriage of Mr. Coulter to Miss Eliza Jane Wilson of Harrison county, Ohio, and she was summoned to the life eternal in the year 1899. In 1901 he consummated a second marriage, being then united to Mrs. Anna L. Karnes of Wisconsin. He was the father of ten children, seven boys and three girls, all of whom are living.

The remains were brought from Traverse City to Central Lake Tuesday, where they were laid to rest amidst the scenes of his many years of labor.

WAS GUEST OF HONOR

Dickens Club Gives Luncheon in Honor of Miss Madeline Mullen.

On Thursday afternoon the home of Mrs. W. J. Raehow, on Park Avenue, was the scene of one of the prettiest events of the season. The occasion was a luncheon given by the Dickens Club in honor of one of its members, Miss Madeline Mullen, whose engagement to Mr. Thos. LaLonde has recently been announced.

Ferns and flowers decorated the dining room, where rose shaded lights threw a softened radiance over the perfectly appointed table where covers were laid for fourteen.
Pink carnations formed the centerpiece from which ribbons were stretched to tiny baskets of sweet peas. At the place of the honor guest was a corsage bouquet of roses and forget-me-nots, and at each place a pink carnation. Tiny birds held the place cards upon which smiling kewpies delineated the disposition of the guests.

After partaking of the delicious and beautifully served from four-course luncheon, appropriate music was furnished by Mrs. Livingston, Mrs. Bush, Mrs. Rachow and Miss Mullen.

Complimentary guests of the club were Mrs. Sara Emery and Mrs. Robt. E. Lee.

PURCHASE NEW BOAT

Fannie M. Rose Will be Placed on Charlevoix-Boyer City Run.

Since disposing of the City of Boyne to Harbor Springs parties, Captains Weaver, Wilbur and Campbell have been scouring the lake ports of northern Michigan for a smaller boat to take its place.

Last week they purchased the Fannie M. Rose of Capt. Emory of Traverse City, and will place her on the run formerly made by the Boyne.

The new boat is about 85 feet long, staunch and seaworthy. She will be brought here this week and thoroughly overhauled, repainted, etc., and placed on the regular scheduled run about the 15th.

Arrived Home Sunday.

Dr. W. R. Barney left for Grand Rapids last Thursday, where he purchased a new Overland automobile. "Doc" drove the car through from this place, arriving in this city Sunday.

WILL PUT ON THREE ACT PLAY

Senior Class of C. H. S. to Present Pygmalion and Galatea

As Part of Commencement Week Program—Cast Has Been Selected.

The Senior Class of Charlevoix High School will present as part of the Commencement Week program Pygmalion and Galatea. The cast of characters has been selected and the members of the class already are showing themselves to be equal to the task of rendering the play in a very pleasing manner.

Pygmalion and Galatea is a mythological comedy in three acts and has been a very popular production, especially during the past few years. Pygmalion, a young and successful artist, also a married man by the way, falls madly in love with a statue which he has carved out of white marble and to which he makes love and prays for the gods to give it life in a way that only becomes a man of his earnestness. During a short period when his wife is out of Athens, the statue suddenly comes to life much to Pygmalion's joy then, but more to his chagrin upon the return of his wife.

Chryso, a patron of the arts, is very desirous of seeing the statue and comes to Pygmalion's studio for that purpose and making a purchase if possible. Upon reaching the studio he is confronted with the beautiful Galatea, the statue suddenly come to life. He is struck with the beauty of the girl and of course is not aware that she is the former marble statue. During a little episode in which he is showering his affections on Galatea, Chryso, is disturbed by the appearance of his wife in the studio.

The play ends with the domestic disturbances all being settled, satisfactory and Galatea, the cause of them all, returning to the marble from which she emerged. The play is full and overflowing with humor, with enough of the serious to make it effective. The members of the cast are as follows:

Pygmalion—Bernice Bush.
Leucippe—Fred Gregory.
Chryso—Horatio Iddings.
Agamemnon—Bernice Pulipher.
Mino—Helap Parsons.
Galatea—Ruth Mitchell.
Cynisca—Marcia Goss.
Dapne—Dorothy Armstrong.
Myrine—Florence Neggison.

Play Festival.

The Marion township Play Festival was held last Monday afternoon in Marion, under the auspices of the Y. M. C. A. The Marion school won first place and the relay. The Phelps school won second place and the honor standard pennant. Archie Balch won the honor standard badge. The ladies of Marion served an excellent dinner in the grange hall in honor of the occasion.

Unrest of Spring Prevalent Nowadays

Residents Unable to Resist Impulse to Try and Improve Conditions By Change of Houses.

A young man carrying an enlarged picture of his mother-in-law under one arm and an axe in the hand on the opposite side of his anatomy ought not to arouse any particular comment at this vernal season of the year.

It is a not uncommon sight. The young man undoubtedly has no evil intent. He is merely toting by hand those things he cherishes most, because he could not find a convenient cranny for them on the dray load of household goods.

These balmy spring days are analogous to and synchronous with the spirit of unrest. The ferment of discontent with what we have and desire for what we haven't surges up strong within us. Spring unrest manifests itself strongly in a determination to change landlords if we be renters, or a desire to make changes in the premises provided we

TIMELY HINTS TO AUTO SPEEDERS

Streets of City Must Not Be Used For Speedway.

Law Will Be Enforced if Residents of Streets Have to Make Complaint.

The city ordinance places the maximum speed limit on Bridge street at ten miles per hour, and on adjoining streets at 15 miles per hour. The state law as well as the city ordinances say that the speed must be such as to insure public safety, even if one can run but two miles or less per hour. This law has been pretty well observed until this season, but now it is a common sight to see machines traveling some of the principal streets of the city at a 25 mile clip.

This practice must be stopped, and will be stopped if the residents of the streets that a few of our auto drivers are using for a speedway, have to take the enforcement of the law into their own hands. The sentiment expressed is that it will be stopped, even if it means arrest and fine for prominent citizens.

In some cases this violation of the speed law may not be willful, but for the good of the automobilist as well as the public at large, a little more care should be used. If speeding on these streets continues, someone is sure to get hurt, and no man would like to have criminal action instituted against him for injuring or perhaps killing a fellow being.

Complaint has been made several times of late, of speeding on Antrim, Mason and Clinton streets, right in the heart of the city. These violators have been warned, or if they have not, will be within the next few days, and if the practice is not stopped, warrants will be issued. It is unfortunate for all that these violators show so little regard for the safety of others, especially of the number of small children who live on the streets above mentioned.

Moderate driving means safety for all; excessive speeding is always attended with danger. Warning is given to be more careful, and no one will have any regrets.

KILN WOOD BURNED

Charlevoix Rock Product Co. Loses Between 350 and 400 Cords of Wood.

Fire from an unknown origin destroyed between 350 and 400 cords of kiln wood at the plant of the Charlevoix Rock Product Company's plant early Monday morning.

The fire was discovered about four o'clock in the morning, and reached such headway that but little could be done to save the wood. Where the fire took place was considered to be the safest place on the yards, being located to the extreme south end of the company's holding, on the road leading to the old city crushing plant.

Besides burning the wood, the fire destroyed the old log house known as the John Lamphear place, an old landmark of the earlier days of Charlevoix.

We see her separated for the first time from her husband when each makes a field bed wherever possible among the boxes, crates, canned fruit and new chairs. And sleeping apart from his manly arm the crash of a flatiron falling from the piano in the still watches of the night echoes like the crack of doom, through the dismantled, disordered rooms.

She dreams uncanny dreams of Indians and robber knights and starts up at their imaginary cries. But the cries, she finds later, emanate from her brave husband, whose feet, in his sleep, have fallen off the ironing board into the cactus plant.

In time they get "settled." The "God Bless Our Home," motto once more adorns the space over the parlor door and the lost minute hand for the clock has finally been found. Peace again abides.

Then they learn two things, or perhaps several. The two in particular are—never to pack the stove legs with the crockery, and to buy a home of their own, a real home, with flower beds, vegetable garden, vines and trees, a home to come back to instead of moving away.

Something to tie to. That's it. Then they can vent their spirit of unrest in improvements. And then they'll decide that, after all—

It is a gay, glad world, this one in which we live.

C. C. BAILEY DEAD

SHEARER---WITHERS

Popular Charlevoix Young People United in Marriage Wednesday Evening.

Slipping away and being married unknown to friends and relatives seems to be growing quite popular in Charlevoix. The young couple pulling off the latest stunt along this line were Clarence Withers, eldest son of Mr. and Mrs. William Withers of Marion township, and Miss Nellie Shearer, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Sandy Shearer of Charlevoix.

The knot was tied at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Julius Koehler on Park avenue, Wednesday night of last week, Rev. Floyd C. Vineyard, pastor of the Baptist church, officiating. When the happy young couple finally decided to let the fact become known, it came as a great surprise, not only to their many friends, but to their parents as well.

Both of the contracting parties are well and favorably known in the city and vicinity, and have the best wishes of their host of friends for a long and prosperous life.

It is a rare occurrence to have a programme involving so many numbers and as many people, so well rendered throughout as was this. From the opening number to the close there was nothing suggesting disappointment, but rather surprise and appreciation at the excellence of each particular number. Those present were richly repaid for their attendance and will remember the event as one of the pleasantest in their memory. To those who were not, it is as impossible to describe it, or any other particular number, as it would be to attempt to describe a Charlevoix summer sunset. Each and every person who took part earned the deepest thanks of each person in the audience for the conscientious and artistic manner in which particular parts were given.

Much credit is also due to the executive committee who planned and were able to carry out and present to the audience such a delightful entertainment.

The Historical Society is one of the institutions in which Charlevoix may justly take pride, and the entertainments they give to the citizens of Charlevoix are always uplifting and cannot fail to contribute to the betterment of the city. In fact they suggest that to its title of "Charlevoix the Beautiful," might fitly be added the words "intellectual and artistic."

ZUDORA In the Twenty Million Dollar Mystery

By HAROLD MACGRATH

Copyright, 1914 and 1915, by Harold MacGrath

SYNOPSIS.

Zudora is left an orphan at an early age. Her father is killed in a gold mine. Zudora and the fortune from the mine, which grows to be worth $200,000, are left in the guardianship of Frank Keene, Zudora's mother's brother, who has set himself up as a Hindu mystic and is known as Hassam Ali. He decides that Zudora must die before she can have a chance to come into possession of her money, so that it may be left to him, the next of kin. Hassam Ali sees an obstacle to his scheme in the person of John Storm, a young lawyer, for whom Zudora has taken a fancy, and he commands the girl to put the man out of her mind. Zudora insists that if she cannot marry Storm she will marry no one.

"Well, well," says Hassam Ali, "solve my next twenty cases and you can marry him; fall in a single case and you must renounce him."

Zudora unravels a mystery and wins her first case—a case in which John Storm is saved from being convicted of a murder instigated by Hassam Ali himself.

Zudora and Hassam Ali visit Nabok Khan's house, where sleep overcomes every one whenever Nabok attempts to marry a princess. Storm, seeking Zudora, is made a prisoner. Zudora foils Nabok Khan, restores the princess to her original lover and saves Storm from death.

A master of diamonds tells Hassam Ali his secret. Storm informs Zudora that his life is being attempted frequently. Storm suspects Hassam Ali. Storm is arrested for stealing the diamond maker's gems, but Zudora discovers the real thieves—a pair of mice.

The negro help employed on Storm's father's farm are fleeing because a great skeleton hand appears at night upon a hill near by. Storm is baffled in his investigation, but Zudora learns that her uncle has employed Jimmy Bolton, a half-witted man, to annoy Storm's parents.

Zudora finds Bolton operating a big magic lantern and is attacked by him. Storm appears and saves her.

Hassam Ali asks Zudora to find a gem lost by two mysterious old men. Zudora gets a photograph of the gem and it burns in her hand. An old house is mined by Hassam Ali and the old men. Storm and Zudora are lured there and narrowly escape destruction when the house blows up.

John McWinter, endeavoring to trap and kill George Smith, killed himself. Smith is charged with murder. Hassam Ali conspires to have John Storm meet the same fate as McWinter, and he and Storm are overcome by powerful fumes.

Zudora saves them, proves that McWinter's own dog trapped and killed him and saves Smith from a band of lynchers.

An inventor blows up a submarine with a powerful heat ray which he sends through water. Hassam Ali sends Zudora to a photographer directly beneath the inventor's laboratory and orders the inventor to kill her. Zudora gets a warning, and her life is saved. The heat ray machine is destroyed, and the photographer, after a quarrel with Hassam Ali, is found dead in the river.

Wu Chang prevents Zudora's elopement with John Storm by hypnotizing her, and he and Hassam Ali attempt to smuggle her out of the country. This plot is frustrated by Storm.

Hassam Ali's double, falls in love with Zudora. Baird and Mme. Du Val kidnap Zudora and the Van Winkle child. Storm rescues them, and Hassam Ali dies.

With Hassam Ali dead Zudora is released of her pledge to solve twenty cases. She confronts, however, the greatest mystery of all, which is the mystery of her own life, and the ambition to secure the vast fortune of $200,000 left to her. This great photo serial is being shown in the leading moving picture theaters by the Thanhouser Film Corporation. Among those participating are Marguerite Snow, Mary Elizabeth Forbes, James Cruze, in the new role of reporter-hero, Sidney Tracey and Frank Farrington.

On looking through her uncle's papers Zudora finds that her father left her an interest in a diamond mine, and Storm and Baird both lend assistance in trying to regain for her possession of this estate which is being appropriated by rogues under the leadership of Mme. Du Val.

They plan to frighten Zudora so that she will run away. Failing, they kidnap Zudora and Howard, the mine superintendent, and put them in a private insane asylum. Howard dies, but Zudora, nearly famished, is rescued by Storm and his friends.

CHAPTER XIV.

The Missing Millions.

It took a fortnight for Zudora to become herself again. The treatment she had received in the sanatorium would have driven insane any woman with less mental balance and physical stamina. She had been ill fed, ill clothed, roughly handled, threatened. She had shut her teeth together and endured.

The death of the mine superintendent did not clear away any clouds. The diamond mine was as far away from Zudora as ever. Storm and Hunt agreed that some one had got into Hassam Ali's papers, and those papers made the ownership of the diamond mines unobtainable.

Hunt questioned Baird in private, but the latter swore on his oath that he had never been able to put his hand on Hassam Ali's money or on his private papers. The Hindu servant had known where these things were, and there was no doubt in Baird's mind that the brown man had taken both gold and papers, the latter being turned over to those who now possessed them.

"There's one thing I'm curious about," said Baird.

"And what's that?"

"That gold mine. Zudora had quite a few thousands at the start. I know she received them. I know she was legally entitled to them. Gold mines do not vanish off the earth in the fashion this one is said to have vanished. Has it occurred to you that the report might have been faked by those most interested in cheating Zudora?"

"We can soon find out. Your idea is a good one, and more than that, it's my opinion that those who are jolly well the diamond mine are cheating into the gold. They've got all the documents, in the case. All right. For awhile we'll chuck the diamond end of it and see what can be done with the gold. Zudora can turn over her interests to Storm, and he can start the bombardment. Suppose I telephone him to meet us up there at her home at once? We can't lose anything by going to it at the drop of the hat."

Baird called at once on Storm and explained his idea.

"So you think these crooks are trying to put that deal over us also? The information came to Zudora unsolicited. Some clerk sent the information."

"A frameup, no doubt. Mr. Storm, we've all got to move mighty smoothly to beat the crowd we're up against. Up to date we have no legal hold. If we go to court with half rights it is quite likely the litigation will run on for years. I don't think you could join an African diamond mine from producing. We might be able to hold up the gold mine for a time, but these people have money, barrels of it, and they'll use it to fight. Now, we want to get the upper hand in this game without having to go in the courts. Suppose you write a letter to the Zudora mine to see where we stand. Ask for information about Trainor, Zudora's father; ask if there are any papers relating to the will, and so forth and so on. Feel them out. If they are crooks out there it's better to know it as soon as possible. Here's Miss Trainor now," wound up Baird as Zudora entered.

She approved of the letter, but it was always money, money, money. She was beginning to hate the sound of it. Why not let the scoundrels have it?

"That isn't the idea, my girl," said Storm. "It isn't the money so much;

it's the principle. I know you're just gone through a terrible ordeal, and it has put fear into you, but we can't let these people go scot free. Do you think I'll ever let up hunting them when I think what they did to you? No, thanks! This bunch of rogues is going to pay the piper for their fox trot."

They all laughed, and then Storm made out his letter to Marcus Villiers, chairman of the board of trustees.

And Mme. Du Val made up her mind to have a little masquerade for the benefit of this same Marcus Villiers. The chairman was coming east to see the real Zudora, supposing, of course, that the fortune was still under her control. There had been an unusually fine vein struck, and he was going east to suggest that she sell outright her holdings.

Baird's idea that there might be an unfulfilled clerk at the mines was a keen one. The superintendent of the mine was of a different caliber from the man who had taken charge of the diamond mine. Brown of the Zudora gold mine was not above doubling his income, and he was not particular how that doubling was brought about. The moment the new find was made he promptly wired Captain Radcliffe that Villiers was arranging to come east and that Detective Hunt, whom Radcliffe had warned him about, would be lured west and put out of business.

When Storm's letter arrived Brown was first to read it. It is needless to say that it did not reach Villiers.

Upon receipt of the wire from Brown, Captain Radcliffe at once sought Mme. Du Val.

"This Brown can be trusted?"

"So long as we pay him well. My dear woman, with a little close sailing we'll have riches beyond our wildest dreams. Millions, and not a soul to step between. Howard is out of the way, and that diamond mine is practically ours, to do with as we please. With this man Villiers sent along after Howard, good night to Zudora and the company. Brown will make an effort to get to Villiers safe, where doubtless some good documents are in existence relative to the mine. Once we can destroy these—Europe, Monte Carlo or the inner palace at Peking if you say so."

"It's not the money with me, Radcliffe; it's the sport of the game. I like to bent the law, to confound it, to make it impotent. It twisted me once."

"This bunch of rogues is going to pay the piper for their fox trot."

But for an old man's folly they would have me still. I was pretty. Du Val had intrigued, and here I am, mistress of his fortune. It's the game with me."

"And it's the cold here, if you want my side of it. I like good things to wear, in fact. I like to spend money for the mere sake of spending it. I'd like to sit in a game of poker without feeling the necessity of slipping an ace from my sleeve." Radcliffe laughed.

"And because I furnished an ace once upon a time—oh, well, the past is the past, and a hand once played can't be played again. I suppose we'll have to put Villiers out of the way. Storm has written him, but Brown intercepted the letter. On my side, as Storm, I've requested him to bring east all his documents. And there's the real game—to get our hands upon those. But I would like to know where our pretty Zudora hid those diamonds. The loot was worth at least fifty thousand."

"Who is this man, Baird?"

"Why, I thought you knew all about him."

"I thought I did. Either he has turned over for leaves or he is playing a deeper game than we are. Madame mused for a moment. "I never could tell when it was Baird or the real Hassam. He was the cleverest make-up man I ever saw."

"And you were just a little bit smitten with him, eh?"

"Well, maybe I was. But I've got over it."

"There's one thing we may be sure—he didn't get into Hassam Ali's trunks. That Hindu was a golem to us. I suppose by this time he is back in India, with trained elephants to fight for him and slave girls to wait upon him. He got Hassam's hoarded gold, all right. The old boy was the shrewdest."

"This Brown can be trusted?"

in the business. By the way, would you mind letting me have a couple of hundreds?"

"Cards?"

"Surely. I've got to have a little recreation for the risks I'm taking and about to take. But I'm going to give you some fine news for the money. It is worth ten thousand instead of two hundred."

"What is it?"

"Mama committed suicide in the Tombs this morning, and the Howard case goes off the calendar with him."

This Man Wants a Majestic Range

Is through with buying of Chicago Mail Order Houses. His experience has been the same as many others who have been stung in the same manner. Read what he says about the Majestic.

Majestic Stove Co.

St. Louis, Missouri

Dear Sir:

Send me the price list of the Majestic Ranges and the name of the firm who handles them in Charlevoix county.

I moved to Charlevoix the first of March and bought a cast range from Montgomery Ward.

But the range is not very satisfactory so I will have to dispose of it to someone, and would like to get a Majestic.

Hoping to hear from you soon, I remain,

Respectfully yours,

AXEL TULANE.

Charlevoix, R. F. D. No. 3.

This man, along with hundreds of others has come to the conclusion that mail order ranges are no good, and pledges his faith in the Majestic. He knew the Majestic, and for this reason, wants to buy another. This is the sentiment expressed by 99 out of a hundred Majestic users. It is the stove that gives universal satisfaction, and the one you should buy when replacing the old, worn out range you are now using. Call at our store and see them.

Sooner or later we all have to pay our game, and we'd have to pay it."

"Mama dead? What a weight off my shoulders! I've been waiting for the police every day since he went to the Tombs. He overdid the Howard business. Of course he had only verbal evidence against us. But if he had broken down under the third degree he would have put us into hot water. More, it would have started the hawks looking me up. And then by-by. We must play a finer hand. No rough stuff from our side except in the case of Hunt. We'll ship Villiers to a spot he can't get back from. If we give him a chance to see the real Zudora it will be plain sailing. Once we have his papers in our possession we can laugh at him."

"You're a wonder. Are you ever going to marry me?"

"Marry you? Not the best man that ever lived! We'd tire of each other in a week. You know it, and I know it. Let us keep to the platonic scheme if you please, captain."

"Now, when Detective Hunt received the wire which was to lure him west he had an idea that it was a lure, but if he pretended to play into the hands of the money he would be likely at least to locate the exact spot the mine lay in. He had found the diamond mine under circumstances far more difficult. With the exact locations of the two properties, he would have guessed out the right. He was all ready to leave his office when Baird came in.

"Where now?"

"Hunt showed him the wire. 'Do you put any faith in it?'"

"Hunt shrugged. 'I want to find where that mine is. I don't care a hang whether this wire is a plant or not.' 'Would you like company?' suggested Baird."

"I should say yes! Will you go?"

"What kind of a yarn will I tell the office?"

"Tell them you've got the mate to the South African story. Add, your expenses will be taken care of by the Trainor estate."

Baird sat down to the telephone. Two minutes later he jumped up with a whoop.

"All O. K.! I'll meet you at the Grand Central in one hour. I'm aching for a shindy."

"You'll get it, I'm thinking. If you come with me," said Hunt grimly.

Marcus Villiers was the son of John Villiers, the banker to whom Trainor had entrusted his mine originally. He was a lively individual, a shrewd business man, but something of a fop. He possessed the only valet in that part of the country, and he kept that valet, not because he needed help, but because it took courage to do so in face of the old timers who held all men-servants in contempt.

A BLUNDER signalized the legislative career of the present administration.

The Democratic tariff bill, first in the articles of Democratic faith, and the one achievement on which naturally they would be expected to expend their most exhaustive study and care, was so clumsily executed that it failed to accomplish the results intended. The failure was due to crude, hasty, unscientific, secret legislative methods.

Designed to furnish sufficient revenue to finance the United States treasury, it has proven absolutely inadequate for that purpose.

In writing the tariff bill, the Democrats dimly foresaw a possible reduction in customs receipts, although they did not know how much and did not ascertain the facts. So the income tax provision was incorporated in the hope that it would make up for any miscalculations in the tariff bill, although the Democrats did not know and did not ascertain the facts.

But what happened when these provisions went into effect?

Customs receipts went millions of dollars below the amount needed from that source, and at the same time collections from the income tax fell many millions below the amount needed from that source. The inevitable result was to leave the treasury without sufficient money for its needs.

The failure was caused by carelessness. Had there been conscientious, open consideration of the revenue bill, sufficient to enable members of congress to study and understand it, the reduction in revenue could have been properly safeguarded. But instead of getting accurate information and adequate estimates, the Democrats guessed at it. And they guessed wrong.

The results of this first mistake should have been a warning. But the startling fact remains that the Democrats committed the same kind of an error again. Forced by their heedlessness to provide more revenue, they passed a "war tax" in time of peace. Based on a guess instead of an estimate, the war tax did not produce money enough. For months the receipts of the treasury have been daily falling short of expenditures at a rate reaching at times more than a million dollars a day. According to official estimates the deficit will probably amount to one hundred million dollars by July 1, the end of the fiscal year.

No chain is stronger than its weakest link. The fatal weakness that has characterized the work of this administration from its inception two years ago, has been its eagerness to propose laws, carelessness in drafting them, haste in committee action, and stubborn refusal to permit intelligent amendment in either house of senate after the party brand had been affixed by the all powerful caucus.

Every American citizen has had to help pay for these costly experiments. There will be still more to pay until the errors have been corrected by thoughtful, intelligent legislation.

Later articles will follow, illustrating still further the slovenly habits of legislation that have characterized the Democratic administration.

WILSON says the country is "vocal only in spots," and that business is "better in spots." We would add that Wilson, too, is spotted—for defeat next year.

The postoffice department started a free employment bureau and then, discharged hundreds of its own employees. Think of the irony of it!

PROGRESSIVES have discovered that the easiest way to win an election is to discover a Republican "tidal wave" and ride it.

MOST of the material that goes into the manufacture of alcoholic drinks can lead a sober, upright life as food products.

It should be a penal offence to grind out "coming through the rye" on a hand organ in Emmet county now.

BAD FIRE AT BRUTUS

Total loss Will Amount to More than Twelve Thousand Dollars.

Fire which started in an empty store building at Brutus, a little town north of Pelleton, last week, destroyed one general store, four residences and numerous smaller buildings before it was gotten under control.

The fire started in a vacant store building adjoining the Maxfield store, and it is thought a tramp who was seen in the vicinity the same night was responsible. The flames spread to the Maxfield store, which was destroyed before any of its contents could be saved. Sparks from the burning store set nearby houses and buildings afire. The loss is estimated to be over $12,000.

The superintendent of a rural Sunday school asked the question: "What binds us together and makes us better than we are by nature? Who can tell?" Little Ellen Smith's hand shot up. "Yes, Ellen; can you tell?" "Yes, sir; corsets."

A little girl was reading a composition of her own on "Grant's Work in the Civil War." She got on swimmingly until she reached Lee's surrender at Appomattox Court House. Then she told how Lee wore his sword and was handsomely attired in full uniform, while Grant, she announced, "had on nothing but an old, ragged union suit."

Goliath, according to Billy Sunday, "was the head cheese and the whole works." "Who's that Gazaboo?" asked David. "Then he gave Goliath the once over." Here the evangelist illustrated the effect on the giant by himself falling at full length upon the platform. The language accompanying the ocular demonstration was "Beamed! David soaked him in the coco between the lamps and Goliath went to the mat and took the count. David chopped his head off and Goliath's gang beat it." And then he stirred the trail hitters with this appeal: "Say, are you riding a blind baggage or a gospel train? I'll know in a minute whether you're men or mutts. If you're a man you'll fight your way down these aisles to take my hand. Oh, I'll have your number! I'll know whether you've got gasoline or dishwater in your veins, whether you're real or a four-flusher."

The Parable of the Tight Wad.

And it came to pass that a certain mnn did fail to pay to the elders of the church any part of his tithe for the living of the minister.

And the deacons, going to him, spake words of praise about the weather and in the end hinteth that the Lord loveth a cheerful giver.

But he of the tight wad fell to railing, saying "Not a jitney will I chip in, for behold, a year hath passed and not once hath the preacher tarried at mine house to call."

And the deacons, reporting these things to the preacher, heard him say "It is even so. I have failed in my duty. I will make amends."

And, behold, in the next twelvemonth the preacher goeth out of his way four times to call upon the man and to speak words of kindness and cheer.

And when the time had come again to chip in, and it was seen that this certain man had not worked through with his bit, the deacons waited upon him with their mitts extended.

But he laugheth and waggeth his head and sayeth, "Nothing is being done. Behold, did I not board the preacher and his horse enough to make up my share of his stipend? Evenso."

And the deacons, returning, meditated upon the length of the way to Tipperary.

LOST TO EAST JORDAN

Charlevoix H. S. Base Ball Team Defeated by East Jordan
Score of 14 to 5.

The expected turning of the tide for the better in the local high school base ball season was a bitter disappointment. East Jordan was too big in a base ball sense for the Charlevoix crew and defeated the locals 14 to 5 on the fair grounds in that city last Friday afternoon. See again on the mound for Charlevoix and pitched consistent ball for the seven innings of play. It was the same old story that was so thoroughly demonstrated in the travesty with Boyne a couple of weeks ago—inability to hit the ball in the pinches, unsteady fielding and poor base ball sense.

The East Arm boys, on the contrary, put up a fair calibre of the national pastime and won the game by the use of the stick and in some instances clever fielding. The locals will couple up with East Jordan again this week Friday at Charlevoix, when we hope to turn the tables. Boyne City will also be played at that place Saturday of this week.

DELICIOUS ACCESSORY.

How to Use Flaming Fruits With Ice Creams and Cold Puddings.

Burning fruits, or, literally, flaming fruits (des fruits, flambees), as accessories to ice cream or cold puddings are a French novelty which American hostesses are adopting. There is something just a little daring in the process, which appeals to many women, and by preparing the branded fruit in a small chafing dish at table it is possible to introduce an interesting feature just at the close of the meal.

Any of the seasonable small fruits, such as red raspberries or cherries, are suited to this use, and larger fruits, peaches, plums, pears and apricots, cut in medium sized bits may be used in the same way. The fruit is covered with equal parts of brandy and kirsch, the lamp of the chafing dish lighted and the mixture stirred gently as it cooks, sugar being sprinkled in from time to time. When hot apply a match to the liquor and have the dish passed while the contents are flaming. It will be found that the hot sauce does not melt the frozen pineapple shell at the last moment. The shell of a large grapefruit holds sufficient for two portions, and the burning fruit sauce is so served at a restaurant noted for its French novelties of service.

When the burning fruit is to be served at a dinner party it is a pretty idea to have the mold of ice cream placed on a large platter with individual sponge cakes at intervals as a border. By previously removing the inside of the little cakes there will be sufficient room for a generous portion of the branded fruit, which should be flaming when brought into the dining room. Each guest takes one of the fruit filled cakes with a portion of the cream.

The same idea may be carried out with a rich and ice cold rice pudding or with a mold of Bavarian cream. When fresh fruits are not obtainable, canned or preserved fruit, drained from their juices, will answer the same purpose, and unique methods of serving will easily suggest themselves to the hostess who is searching for novelties.

CARE OF SWEATERS.

How to Wash the Knitted Jacket Successfully.

The following method, if carefully followed, will result in great satisfaction to the one who wants a shapely sweater after it has been subjected to the process of cleansing. After the ordinary methods, as we all know, the sweater is such an unsightly object as to be forever shorn of its original beauty.

Prepare a suds with lukewarm water, being particular to have plenty of water so that the sweater can be thoroughly cleansed. Pass it through the suds, gently pressing and lifting until it appears to be perfectly clean. Pass through several lukewarm rinse waters and then through water slightly lamed. Do not wring or stretch in any way. Next pin a clean piece of muslin firmly on a board wide enough to take the sweater in its natural shape. Place the sweater on the board dripping wet with front out, placing and shaping it until exact shape and size as when worn. Lay in a straight line and when front is thoroughly dry turn over carefully and dry the back. When it is thoroughly dry you will find that it is in its natural shape, with neck, cuffs and sleeves in perfect proportion.

DRINKING BEFORE MEALS.

At a meeting of a medical society a prominent physician read a paper on "Appetizers," in which he gave the results of scientific experiments made at Yale university. Dr. E. H. Cleveland of Flower hospital, New York city, writing of these to the New York Times, says:

"It seems that to one group of students a good dinner was given without alcoholic accompaniment, and in their case, a couple of hours later, normal digestion was found well advanced. To the other group of students the same dinner was given, preceded in each case by an 'appetizer,' such as cocktail, gin fizz, etc. After the same interval the digestive processes of this second group were found on examination to be imperfect. Certain chemical elements in the food taken showed that the digestive juices had failed to act upon them, owing to the presence of alcohol in combination with these elements.

"Serious and permanent interference with normal digestion was clearly proved by these experiments in every instance. Had the investigations been carried further, so as to include the efficiency of mental action and nerve reaction, as well as efficiency of digestive faculties, there is no doubt that precisely similar results would have been obtained.

"The appetizer, so called, is not in reality an appetizer at all, but is a devil-taker, pure and simple, destructive of the normal processes of the digestive apparatus and of the mental powers in direct proportion to the frequency with which it is taken."

CONCERNS DEMAND ABSTINENCE.

The Milton Manufacturing company, the American Car & Foundry company, and S. J. Shimer & Sons of Milton, Pennsylvania, have issued orders demanding that their employees abstain from alcohol and refuse to sign license petitions of otherwise indicate sympathy for the saloon.

Thirty men were discharged by the American Car & Foundry company because they signed liquor license applications.

These companies do not desire to influence the opinions of the employees in regard to prohibition, but they take the stand that the man who signs a liquor license application does not properly appreciate the danger of liquor to himself and the community. He is, therefore, not a safe employe for a concern demanding efficiency.

"Indulgence in the use of liquor is a menace to all business interests," declared Mr. George S. Shimer, president of the Milton Manufacturing company. "If the employees should be protected by the employer, why shouldn't the employer be as well protected by the employee? Our employees have congratulated us upon the step, we have taken."

KANSAS TAX RATE DECREASES.

In 1880, under license, the Kansas tax rate for state purposes was 5.5 mills on the dollar. The Nebraska rate was only 3.9 mills. In 1881 the Kansas rate dropped to 5 mills, while the Nebraska rate increased to 6.1. In 1882 the figures stood: Kansas, 4.5; Nebraska, 6.7. In 1883 the rate was, Kansas, 4.3; Nebraska, 7.5. In 1885 the Kansas rate had further dropped to 3.9, but Nebraska, with saloons to pay part of her revenue, had been compelled to raise her rate to 7.7.

In 1914 Kansas had reached the remarkably low figure of 1.2 mills, while Nebraska, whose people failed to follow Kansas' example in outlawing saloons, was suffering under a rate of 7.8 mills.

"And yet," says the Portland (Me.) Evening Express, "the booze representatives in local option contests have the effrontery to warn the people against outlawing the saloons because 'You will have to pay more taxes!'"

INCREASED SAVINGS.

M. Kharitonoff, comptroller of the currency for the Russian empire, in a speech before the duma budget committee announced that "the national savings which in December, 1913, amounted to 700,000 roubles ($350,000), had increased to 29,100,000 roubles ($14,550,000) in December, 1914. The total savings for 1913 amounted to 34,000,000 roubles ($17,000,000) as compared with $1,000,000 roubles ($2,000,000) for 1914."

STRIKE AT THE ROOT.

A gentleman having called in his physician, said: "Now, sir, I want no more trifling; my illness is serious, and my desire is that you should strike at the root of my disease."

"It shall be done," said the physician, and, lifting his walking-stick, he smashed to atoms the wine decanter which stood on the table.

ALSO LOSES INDEBTEDNESS.

Moundville, W. Va., has reduced its floating indebtedness from $52,000 to $8,630. "This floating indebtedness was piled up several years ago while the city had a big income from saloon license," says the Moundville Echo. Now that the city has lost the saloon revenue it has also rid itself of the indebtedness.

A FRIEND IN NEED

A FRIEND INDEED

Jonathan's Love For David—A Model Friendship—Its Test—Its Endurance. Its Basis—Friendship Being Lost. Selfishness an Impending Danger.

"A friend loveth at all times."—Prov. 17:17.

History records noble examples of friendship; but supreme amongst these is the friendship, the love, of Jonathan, Saul's son and prospective heir of the throne of Israel, for David, his rival in the people's hearts and in the Divine Program. The unselfishness of his friendship demonstrates a nobility of character possessed by some in those days, and quite in contrast with the Evolution theory.

Jonathan's loving spirit stands out in strong contrast with King Saul's jealous spirit. Apparently Jonathan's first meeting with David was after the bitter victory over Goliath. Instead of thinking of David as a rival, who must be crushed, the noble Jonathan took off his own princely robe and gave it to David, together with his sword and his famous bow.

"A Friend in Need, a Friend Indeed." Jonathan's friendship, love, was not of the effervescent kind. He did not love merely in word, but in deed and in truth. He loved his friend just the same when the king became David's enemy and sought his life. The friendship which will not endure trial, which will make no sacrifices, is not the kind to be approved or modeled after.

Jonathan had love of the kind which the Lord admonishes His followers to have—the love which in honor prefers one another. This love doubtless stands pre-eminent above earthly love, especially because founded upon a religious basis. Because David loved God and sought to be guided by His will, he conducted himself with wisdom; and because Jonathan discerned this spirit of wisdom and righteousness, he loved David.

In proportion as we understand the Bible and receive the spirit of the Truth, we shall appreciate and copy the best there is of principle—whether of friendship or of duty to a monarch, to our family or toward God. There are many influences operating toward a spirit of selfishness, avarice, jealousy; while the influences for true friendship, while true love—the best qualities of heart and head—are from the Lord.

We noted in a previous lesson how Jonathan acted as peacemaker between his father and David. Today's lesson relates another occasion when Jonathan acted the part of a true friend. Realizing that his life was in danger, David mentioned his fears to Jonathan. The latter was at a loss to believe that his father would break his word, yet was impressed by David's attitude. The feast of the new moon was at hand; and David was expected to sit at the royal table. In harmony with an arrangement between the two friends, Jonathan was to find out definitely his father's intentions and to communicate them to David.

On the second day of the feast the king asked for "the son of Jesse," as though he hated the very name David. Jonathan replied that David had gone to Bethlehem by his permission. Apparently the king had been fooled in his intention to kill David at this time, and he vented his wrath upon his son, whom really he greatly loved. In his anger he threw his javelin at Jonathan, probably not with the intention of striking him, but merely of venting his ferocious jealousy. Jonathan's speech in return shows that he was thinking less of what he himself was risking and more respecting the injustice being done his friend.

It is a beautiful friendship which in stress forgets self and thinks only of the friend's interests. As in contrast with all human loves and friendships, we read of Jesus,

"Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends." Nevertheless, in Jesus' case it meant more than any earthly love or friendship; for "while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us." The that the Lord thus set an example to all Christians, that they should lay down their lives for the brethren. This is Heavenly love, Divine friendship, of which Jonathan's love is a sample.

"Is It Not Beyond Thee?" The next morning David, having returned, was to get Jonathan's judgment respecting the king's sentiments. Jonathan was to go into the field near a great rock and there to give an agreed-upon signal, if David should flee. And so it was done. Jonathan then went over to the rock, behind which David hid. The two embraced, after the manner of the East, kissing each other goodly—true lovers, with a manly, noble love.

Here Jonathan indicated his faith in God's providence respecting David, and asked him to make a covenant that whatever should come David would deal graciously with Jonathan and his family. Bible History shows us that David never forgot the obligation which he thus laid back to his friend to the family of Saul.

THEATRICAL

"John Barleycorn."

When it comes to delineating the struggles of the soul Jack London writes with an X-ray concealed in his pen. The psychological details of the ancient fight between Reason in Man and The Evil Spirit in Alcohol have never been portrayed with greater pathos and with greater truthfulness than in his famous story of "John Barleycorn."

The settings are, with perhaps two or three exceptions, taken from Nature directly. This is one of the greatest charms of this feature. The tale is one of the sea, in great measure, and we can almost smell the salt air and hear the murmurs of the waves—so much is there of realistic atmosphere all through the six parts. The underworld of seafaring men is brought before us in most faithful depiction, which aims to show the dehumanizing effects of strong drink on the frame and the soul of man. Such figures as "Scratch Nelson," or as the old saloonkeeper, or the parents of the man who struggles with John Barleycorn, or the old colored nurse, are absolutely convincing.

The leading part was taken by Elmer Clifton.

John Barleycorn is not a drama, unless we choose to see a drama in the lonely heart struggle of the individual. John Barleycorn is a biography, roughly and somewhat loosely scattered through the leaves of a diary. It is a record of personal experiences, profoundly interesting and pathetic. It is the most powerful moral lesson ever conveyed in films.

The photography shows the advantages of the California light. These advantages, however, are sometimes balanced by the difficulty in handling such rich light.

WEATHER CONDITIONS FAVORABLE

For Big Fruit Crop in Northern Michigan This Season.

Marketing Resources the Hardest Proposition Facing Those Interested in Fruit Growing.

The weather conditions so far have been favorable for a big fruit crop for northwestern Michigan for the coming season. Not in years have we had a winter that was as mild as the one that has just closed. Not even the tenderest fruit buds were injured even in the most exposed places. Winter shaded into spring so slowly that it is difficult to tell when one season ended and the other began. As spring advanced the weather became warmer until the last week in April the temperature was almost of summer standard. Under the warm wave many of the fruit trees burst into blossom, fully two weeks ahead of the usual time. Once by this blossoming period, however, all will be well. It looks now that while we are going to get some cool weather there will be no killing frost. This means that the biggest fruit crop in the history of the region will have to be marketed. The cherry trees are full of blossoms, as are also the peach, pear, plum and apple.

The marketing resources of the entire region are going to be taxed to dispose of the fruit in a profitable manner. This must be done, otherwise those who have been induced by the railroads and large land owners to make heavy investments in lands, to clear the same, set orchards and plant crops, will become discouraged and neglect their orchard propositions to the detriment of the region. The promised big fruit crop must be better marketed than has any previous crop, otherwise the "jig will be up." It will not be surprising if this season's crop is double that of any previous year, for this is the season for the trees set the spring following the big harvest in 1909 to come into bearing. Every bit of marketing machinery in the region is going to be taxed and all the help that the recently organized co-operative associations can give will be needed to get the crop sold at a profit, and what is the use of growing a fruit if it cannot be made to yield a profit?

Economy Hints

A penny saved is a penny earned.—Benjamin Franklin.

WHILE every one is looking with horror at the sums represented by the butchers' bills and investigating committees are urging us all to substitute vegetables and fish for the usual meat, the fact remains that most people like to have meat somewhere in their dietaries. So, while the clever housewife will plan menus that contain these substitutes for meat and give her family meals that satisfy and please, she will also keep her thoughts on the possibilities of using cuts of meat with which she is perhaps not well acquainted.

Miss Jessie P. Rich of the division of home welfare of the University of Texas has offered some recipes for cooking tough meats that may prove suggestive. She warns the housewife, however, against being deceived in purchasing cheap cuts of meat that require a great deal of seasoning and flavoring in order that they may be palatable or that use up a large amount of heat for cooking and much energy on the part of the cook. The fireless cooker solves some of these difficulties, and Miss Rich's recipes are planned with a view to being as economical as possible.

Beef Stew.—Use the brisket or rump. Cut two pounds of stew meat into small cubes and put one-third into a greased skillet to brown. When well browned on all surfaces add this to the remaining meat, cover with cold water and bring slowly to the boiling point. Boil for a few minutes and place at the back of the stove to cook slowly for three or four hours, or until tender. When the meat is tender and the water nearly evaporated add about one cupful of cooked string beans and one can of tomatoes which have had a part of the water evaporated from them. Season and serve. Potatoes may be added also.

Mock Duck.—Chuck steak or bottom round. Take a round or chuck steak, cut about an inch thick, place on clean paper, wipe, trim and slash the upper surfaces. Make dressing of bread crumbs, butter, salt, pepper and onion. If desired, add spread on the surface of the meat. Roll up the steak and tie securely. Now brown the exposed surface well and cook on a hot plate in a fireless cooker or in the double boiler. If cooked in the fireless cooker a small amount of water will need to be added to the steak, but no water is necessary in the double boiler. This takes about three hours to cook.

Mutton Stew.—Neck pieces of mutton. Cut two pounds of mutton into small pieces, cover with cold water and bring to boil quickly. Boil a few minutes and place on the back of the stove to cook slowly for several hours. Prepare about a half cupful of several vegetables cut into small pieces, as potatoes, carrots, onions, turnips, etc., and add to the stew in time to have the vegetables thoroughly cooked. When all is tender thicken the gravy with flour and season with salt and pepper. Stews may be made on the fireless cooker. Here we have an excellent means of cooking the meat at a low temperature.

Collage Pie.—Cover the bottom of a buttered baking dish with mashed potatoes. Add a thick layer of finely chopped soup meat or meat left from stew etc., season with salt, pepper, onion juice and moisten with some of the stock or gravy. Cover with mashed potatoes. Bake until well heated through. Cooked rice or macaroni can be substituted for the potatoes.

Veal Birds.—Veal steak from foreleg. Wipe, remove bone, trim and cut into pieces about three inches square or smaller pieces, shaped as the muscular division of the meat determines. Make a dressing of bread crumbs, salt and pepper and spread on the veal. Roll this and tie or pin with a toothpick, roll these birds in egg and crack, brown well in a small amount of fat, add a cupful of boiling water or a can of heated tomatoes, cover tightly and bake for an hour in a moderate oven or cook slowly on top of stove.

How to Wash Chamois Gloves and Not Harm Them.

Put one glove on the hand. Apply strong lather made from soap and fresh milk and use a soft brush or a fine piece of flannel; keep the strokes toward the ends of the fingers. Apply until the dirt disappears, then take a clean soft towel and dab the glove till the soap is removed. Take the glove from the hand and blow it to open the fingers. Place a piece of string through one of the buttonholes and hang the glove up in a warm place where there is a current of air. When dry the gloves will have regained their color and will be smooth and soft.

How to Use Shields Under Thin Lacy Bodices.

A combination of net under bodice, brassiere and arm shield will be found a great convenience in hot weather. These in plain styles are quite inexpensive and will wash. They come however, trimmed with lace if so desired. Since shields if worn at all must be separate from the outside bodice on account of the lacy nature of these combination garments this is a want.

VIOLIN RECITAL

Very Successful Event Put on by the Pupils of St. Mary's School.

A number of the music lovers of Charlevoix and the music pupils of St. Mary's assembled at the studio recently to be present at a recital given by John Yokes and Arthur Edwards, the occasion being their promotion to the second grade. The purpose of these recitals is to prepare students for appearance at public performances.

Much praise is due both these young musicians, as their study of this kind of instruments has been exceedingly limited, the former having completed his grade after three months' study. They were assisted by Olivette Allard, accompanist, Eileen Fairchild and Kathryn Gaskin, piano solos; John Smith and Harold Cartier, reader. Following are the numbers:

BOOMED FOR PRESIDENT

"William Alden Smith for President" Club Organized at Lansing.

On Friday at Lansing, William Alden Smith looked upon a great throng of admirers from all sections of the state; heard himself made the choice of the people of Michigan for the Republican nomination for the presidency; heard the eloquence of Congressman Patrick H. Kelly urging his name for this, the highest gift of the people.

The meeting was that of the newly organized "William Alden Smith for President Club." The choice of the club had gone there in response to weeks of urging. Representative hall was filled with members of the legislature, state officers, friends from all over Michigan who went just to help the cause along, and, best of all, by a substantial delegation from his own home town of Grand Rapids.

An Interview With Mr. Ford

This is the most important advertisement I ever caused to be published--read every word ---and then marvel

On a personal visit to Mr. Ford I broached the subject of a possible August 1st rebate

The Ford Motor Company announced last year, as you will remember, that if their total sales reached 300,000 cars between August 1st, 1914, and August 1st, 1915, each purchaser during that period would receive back a fund of $40 to $60.

"Mr. Ford," I suggested, "is there anything I can say to our people with regard to the Ford Motor Company's 300,000 car rebate plan?"

"We shall sell the 300,000," was the quiet reply; "and in eleven months, a full month ahead of August first."

"Then a refund is practically assured?" "Yes--barring the totally unexpected. We are 50,000 to 75,000 cars behind orders today. Factory and branches are sending out 1,800 daily."

I then said to Mr. Ford, "If I could make a definite refund statement we would increase our local sales three hundred cars."

"You may say," was Mr. Ford's deliberate and significant reply to this, "you may say that we shall pay back to each purchaser of a Ford car, between August 1st, 1914, and August 1st, 1915, barring the unforeseen, the sum of $50. You may say that I authorized you to make this statement."

What can I add to the above? $15,000,000 cash coming back to Ford owners! and to prospective Ford owners up to August 1st, 1915, it actually means: Ford touring cars for $490—less the $50 rebate. Ford runabouts for $440 less the $50 rebate! What is there left for me to say?

BLEW UP IN EIGHTH INNING

C. H. S. Loses Second Game to Boyne City by Score of 11 to 2.

Team Showed Real Fighting Spirit, But Were Unable to Hold Their Opponents Down.

Clouting the ball like a bunch of veterans and fielding like a Donnie Bush for six straight innings, Charlevoix blew up in the closing of the eighth frame at Boyne City last Saturday in the second joint with the East Arm lads, allowing eight runs to cross the rubber and subsequently put the game on ice for the home boys. The final count was 11-2.

The old adage, "It's a long lane that has no turn," surely got Charlevoix's goat last Saturday. Every inning the rout on the side lines awaited expectantly for the regular balloon ascension, but every inning saw the local high men go onto the field with more "pep" and put a calibre of ball that is seldom witnessed in Northern Michigan ball lots. Even the players themselves sort of wondered how it was happening and instead of endeavoring to give the jinx that has accompanied the team the entire season, a knock-out blow, they premeditated on that fact until after having the upper chance to win they presented Boyne City the game on a silver platter.

There is one thing we can't forget however, and that was the real fighting spirit the Charlevoix crew put into the first seven laps of the contest. It was real base ball with sensational catches, head work and some nice hitting that was sprinkled around in the tight places.

Charlevoix began the affair in the first frame when with two on Parsons drove a single to center scoring Shapton and Krulik. For three innings Boyne City was unable to analyze Mascho's curves and not a man reached the initial sack. Both teams settled down to real playing after the opening inning and went through inning after inning in nice fashion. Charlevoix took a brace in the seventh and by a swat for two bases by Krulik and another single by Parsons the clouds cleared away from the Charlevoix dug-out only to fall back together again still darker when two men were retired by Kuhns.

Boyne City scored first in the fourth getting all the way around an error by Hallett, a stolen base and two wild throws. In the sixth two more runs came in for Boyne, assisted by a base on balls, a sacrifice hit and two clean singles and a couple of stolen bases. This inning prophesied of worse things to come and there was no disappointment, for in the eighth everything became dark and the way Boyne hit the pill and ran bases was only superseded by the way Charlevoix booted the ball and threw recklessly around the diamond. Eight runs came in, six hits registered, one a three-sacker and two others for doubles. The slaughter was awful to look upon, but the boys stuck it out to the finish, which occurred after Boyne had sent twelve men to bat. The next inning closed in the old-time fashion, and amidst the echoes of the empty grandstand, Charlevoix beat the retreat to the city.

Mascho made his first appearance on the mound for Charlevoix and put up a class of ball that brought credit to him. See's retirement last week placed Coach Vogt in a farther precarious position as hurlers goes, and at the last moment he was forced to send Mascho to the rescue. The fact that he struck out eight men in his first pitching battle shows that he has the stuff and will be a comer if he stays by. Mascho was weak in field but was on the job every minute using his head. Kuhns didn't have anything on the ball that was dangerous, but the local men seemed to be unable to connect safely, although they hit him at will. The backing Kuhns received was spectacular at times.

The altercation made during the week in positions made a better showing for the Charlevoix aggregation. Parsons on first, Krulik on third, Hallett at short and Thompson behind the bat all displayed themselves in good style.

As usual Aldred, the Boyne City midge-catcher, gave a good account of himself. Two clean clouts, one for three sacks, a sacrifice hit and a couple of stolen bases. Aldred is one of the best high school catchers that ever donned a suit and has a bright future before him. The best thing about him is he is an even-going square young chap. These things count in base ball as in anything else.

FELL INTO CELLAR

E. H. Barnard Victim of Accident That Will Lay Him Up For Some Time.

E. H. Barnard, who lives about two miles south of the city, was the victim of a peculiar accident last Tuesday forenoon, that will confine him to his bed for a long time and possibly result in serious trouble on account of his advanced age.

Mr. Barnard was moving his house when the accident occurred. A cellar about ten feet in depth had been dug, walls built, and while helping move the house, in some manner he slipped and fell into the cellar, striking on his left side, breaking his leg a few inches below the hip.

Dr. R. B. Armstrong was called and reduced the fracture, and the patient is doing as well as could be expected. The break is a bad one, and owing to his advanced age, it will be a long time before he recovers from the shock and confinement.

DIED VERY SUDDENLY

Mrs. Ames Webster Had Been Ill But a Short Time Before Stricken by Death.

Following an illness lasting only a few days, Mrs. Edith Webster, wife of Amos Webster, May street, passed away last Thursday. Funeral services were held from the home on Saturday afternoon at 4 o'clock, at which Rev. Quinton Walker, pastor of the First Methodist church, and the order of the Eastern Star had charge. Interment was made in Brookside cemetery.

The deceased was 36 years old and had lived in Charlevoix for the last twenty-five years, coming here from Wisconsin. The husband, one son and a daughter of this city, two sisters, Mrs. Geo. Bacot, Charlevoix and Miss Eva Cram; two brothers, Nellie Cram, Charlevoix, and Morris Cram of Washington are left to mourn their loss.

Ten days ago Mrs. Webster was taken suddenly ill and an operation for appendicitis was found to be urgent. Mrs. Webster was taken ill Wednesday and the operation occurred Friday night a week ago. The operation was successful and but for the setting in of complications, recovery would have occurred. After a week of suffering, death came as a relief.

FUNERAL SERVICES HELD SATURDAY

Many Friends Gather to Pay Last Respects to Mrs. S. S. Ellsworth.

Came to Charlevoix to Reside Twenty Years Ago—Interment at Brookside Cemetery.

Mrs. Sally Sterling Ellsworth, one of the oldest residents in the city, passed away at her home on Mason street last Wednesday afternoon at 5 o'clock, at the age of 85 years. Mrs. Ellsworth had been ailing for several months and death at the time it came was not altogether unexpected. The funeral services were held from the Methodist church Saturday afternoon and the body laid to rest in Brookside cemetery.

Rev. Quinton Walker, pastor of the Methodist church, officiated both at the services at the church and at the grave. Sallie Potter was born in Ellsburg, New York state in October, 1829. When she was nineteen years old, she came to the southern part of Michigan with the family which was led here by the great wave of western migration that swept the eastern states at that time. Two years was also spent in Vinton, Iowa, by the family. Twenty years ago Mrs. Ellsworth came to Charlevoix where she spent the remainder of her life in her own home here.

Mrs. Ellsworth is survived by one child, Mrs. G. W. Priest of this city. Mrs. Ellsworth was a member of the First Methodist church of Charlevoix and had always taken an active part in religious affairs until declining years caused her retirement.

MAY FESTIVAL

Will Be Given by School Children of Petoskey on Thursday, May 20th.

Arrangements for the 4th annual May festival under the auspices of the Petoskey federation of women's clubs are completed. All concerts will be given in the high school assembly room, and the committee announces the following programs:

Thursday evening, May 20th, at 8 o'clock, children of the public schools, directed by the supervisor of music, will give the first concert. The program will consist of choruses cleverly arranged as a cantata in harmony with the thought of fairies, flowers and springtime, with incidental songs and instrumental music. There will be two queens, gay and dainty costuming and a scenic floral stage setting. The musical work of the Petoskey public schools is of a high standard and the children may be relied upon to worthily lead the musical festival.

On the afternoon of Friday, May 21, at 3:30 o'clock, Mrs. Viola Crow Parcell, of Grand Rapids, will give a "Piano Lecture Recital." The committee is fortunate in securing this distinguished artist who will be the first to present a piano lecture recital to a Petoskey audience. The recital will be of interest to the musical and the non-musical; but, it will be of real value to students of the piano. Piano pupils from near and far will attend Mrs. Parcell's recital.

That evening at 8 o'clock a concert of the highest order will be presented under the direction of Wm. McCollum and Mrs. Leon Chiechester. The program will be miscellaneous in character, including several selections from grand opera. In addition to leading local singers and musicians, Wilbur Starr will be heard in several numbers. N. M. I. TRACK MEET MAY 29

Annual Event to Be Pulled Off in Petoskey This Year.

Local Track Candidates Busy Getting Into Shape For Event—Four Schools to Enter.

Invitations are out for the Northern Michigan Interscholastic Track Meet at Petoskey, Saturday, May 29. The meet will probably be one of the best that has ever been staged in the northern counties and will be doubtful as to the winner till the last event is finished. Interest is running at high water mark in all the cities entered, and large delegations, both as entries and spectators, will visit Petoskey at that time.

The local track candidates received rejuvenated spirit the first of the week and twenty-five men appeared for work Monday night. The county meet will be held one week previous to the interscholastic meet and at that time it will be possible to get some light on the result of Charlevoix in the big affair. Van Allsburg, Mason, Olney and Arnold are tearing off the sprint and distances in fair shape, while Taggart and Butler will be heard from in the high jump. In the other events the men are working hard and hope to make an accountable showing.

It is expected that East Jordan, Boyne City and Traverse City, besides the local school from this side of Petoskey, will enter. At the present writing no arrangements have been definitely settled upon to transfer spectators, but the managers are endeavoring to secure boat service.

GASOLINE EXPLODED

Barber Shop Owned by S. M. Rose Badly Burned by Fire Tuesday Morning.

Fire, caused by an explosion of gasoline, badly wrecked the interior of the barber shop owned by S. M. Rose, early Tuesday morning.

The shop had been opened for the day's business by the colored porter, who said the fire started when he was generating a gasoline burner under the hot water tank. After generating the burner with alcohol, he turned on the gasoline, and in a flash an explosion occurred, badly singeing him about the face and hands.

The interior of the shop was badly burned, including the breaking of the large mirrors from the extreme heat, and ruining the other fixtures. Mr. Rose carried insurance to the amount of $100 on the building and $100 on the fixtures, and estimates that his loss on fixtures alone will exceed the insurance by $100 or more. New fixtures will be purchased at once, and the shop will be again opened as soon as possible.

BAPTIST CHURCH NOTES

BY THE PASTOR

Largest attendance ever in our Sunday school last Sunday. Bring some one with you next time.

The Bible is an easy book to understand. Some folks say not, but these same people never read it enough to know. I believe the Bible says just what it means and means just what it says. Plain English is not hard to understand.

Too many folks now-a-days are trying to get away from the truth—the plain teaching of God's word—by giving what Dr. Jones or Dr. Brown or Dr. Smith, L. L. D., said about it. As for me, I prefer to know what Dr. Jesus said about it.

We have had the Ben Hur, I. O. O. F. and K. of P. with us in our services so far. Glad to have you come, friends. Oh, but if each of you would give yourself to our Lord and then "be buried with Him by baptism into death," how much more christian strength would exist in our city.

We had a great service at Burgess last Sunday. The orchestra from Bay Shore came over and played for us. The house was packed full—nearly 100 in Sunday school and standing room at a premium during service. Collection nearly $10.00. Thank you, boys, come again and may the Good Lord bless each of you.

Why are so many people in Charlevoix not Christians? Answer: Because a large per cent of you professed christians are asleep. Some of you never have sought to get any one to Christ; others of you have not prayed in six months, or if you did it was when you were sick and thought you would die. You need an electric shock or dynamiteing one.

Yours in the Muster's Name,
Lloyd C. Vineyard.

CHANGES IN GAME AND FISH LAWS

Summary of Various Changes Made by Adjourned Legislature.

Trout Season Now Closes on the Last Day of August—Allows Hunter But One Deer.

The legislature at this session made numerous changes in the game and fish laws. This summary was compiled by the state game and fish wardens department.

The Senator Odell bill consolidates all the laws in on general law and repeals, whether local or general which conflict with it. The laws which it has consolidated are the present inland fishing law; the general law permitting spearing through the ice; the general law prohibiting the use of certain kinds of apparatus for taking fish in the inland lakes and the general law relative to the protection of bass.

Set Lines Prohibited

The new features of this bill provide that a book and line shall be construed to be a single line and single hook or hooks attached, while held in the hand or under immediate control; it shortens the season for taking suckers, mullet, red-sides and grass pike with spear and dipnet in the inland streams two months, but permits their use during March and April in each year; it cuts out the use of all kinds of set lines, except that five lines, to be termed "ice lines," may be used for the purpose of taking all kinds of fish except brook trout and bass through the ice during January and February of each year; it also permits the use of spears through the ice during January and February for all kinds of fish except bass and trout. It provides, however, that any local acts which prevent spearing of fish during any season of the year are exempt from the provisions of this act.

It changes the close of the season on brook trout back to Sept. 1, as it was prior to 1913; it provides that brook trout shall include all the different kinds of trout found in our inland waters, without regard to the technical description or scientific name of the species.

It provides that blue gills, sun fish, rock bass, white bass, calico bass, perch, wall-eyed pike and crappies shall be regulated by length as follows: Blue gills and sun fish, five inches; rock bass, white bass and calico bass, six inches; perch and crappies, five inches; wall-eyed pike, ten inches. Only 25 of the different species can be taken in one day, and no fish taken from the inland waters can be sold or offered for sale. It prevents the possession of any kind of a net, except dip nets, for the purpose of taking fish; and no person can have any net except dip net, jack or artificial light of any kind, dynamite, giant powder or any explosive substance or combination of substances, within one-half mile of an inland lake or stream; and makes it prima facie evidence of a violation of the law for any person to have any such contrivance for the purpose of taking fish within such limit.

Closed Season on Quail

Amendments to the general game law, being the Senator Hilsendegen bill, prohibits spring shooting of all kinds of wild water fowl. Hunting partridge or other game birds or animals with automobiles is prohibited. The number of deer that can be shot during the annual hunting season, is cut to one. The opening of the rabbit hunting season is changed from Sept. 1 to Oct. 1 to conform to the opening of the bird season.

Squirrels and quail are protected until 1920. Wood duck are protected until 1918. Shell-drake, mergansers, heron and tern may be killed by a permit of the state game warden when it is known that they are destroying fish in inland waters.

One other bill amends the hunters' license act by providing that all persons, except farmers while hunting on their own lands, must have a license from the state game warden, costing $1.

Kidney troubles attack Charlevoix Men and Women, Old and Young.

Kidney ills seize young and old. Often come with little warning. Children suffer in their early years. Can't control the kidney secretions. Girls are languid, nervous, suffer pain.

Women worry, can't do daily work. Men have lame and aching backs. If you have any form of kidney ills you must reach the cause—the kidneys.

Doan's Kidney Pills are for weak kidneys.

Have brought relief to Charlevoix people.

Charlevoix testimony proves it. Mrs. M. Olney, 310 W. Harbort ave., Charlevoix, says: "I consider Doan's Kidney Pills a valuable kidney remedy. I have taken them several times for kidney complaint and severe backaches and have been greatly benefited. Others of the family have used Doan's Kidney Pills, procured at the Ivy Drug store, for back and pains in the kidneys and have had good results."

ZUDORA In the Twenty Million Dollar Mystery

By HAROLD MACGRATH

Copyright, 1914 and 1915, by Harold MacGrath

SYNOPSIS.

Zudora is left an orphan at an early age. Her father is killed in a gold mine and the fortune from the mine, which grows to be worth $20,000,000, are left in the guardianship of Frank Keene. Zudora's mother's brother, who has set himself up as a Hindu mystic and is known as Hassam Ali. He decides that Zudora must die before she can have a chance to come into possession of her money, so that it may be left to him, the next of kin. Hassam Ali sees an obstacle to his scheme in the person of John Storm, a young lawyer, for whom Zudora has taken a fancy, and he commands the girl to put the man out of her mind. Zudora insists that if she cannot marry Storm she will marry no one.

"Well, well," says Hassam Ali, "solve my next twenty cases and you can marry him; fail in a single case and you must renounce him."

Zudora unravels a mystery and wins her first case—a case in which John Storm is saved from being convicted of a murder indicated by Hassam Ali himself.

Zudora and Hassam Ali visit Nabok Rhan's house, where sleep overcomes every one whenever Nabok attempts to marry a princess. Storm, seeking Zudora, is made a prisoner. Zudora follows Nabok Rhan, restores the princess to her original lover and saves Storm from death.

A maker of diamonds tells Hassam Ali his secret. Storm informs Zudora that his life is being attempted frequently. Storm suspects Hassam Ali. Storm is arrested for stealing the diamond maker's gems, but Zudora discovers the real thieves—a pair of mice.

The negro help employed on Storm's father's farm are fleeing because a great skeleton hand appears at night upon a hill near by. Storm is baffled in his investigation, but Zudora learns that her uncle has employed Jimmy Bolton, a half-witted man, thus to annoy Storm's parents. Zudora finds Bolton operating a big magic lantern and is attacked by him. Storm appears and saves her.

Hassam Ali asks Zudora to find a gem lost by two mysterious old men. Zudora gets a photograph of the gem and it burns in her hand. An old house is mined by Hassam Ali and the old men. Storm and Zudora are lured there and narrowly escape destruction when the house blows up.

John McWinter, endeavoring to trap and kill George Smith, is killed himself, and Smith is charged with murder. Hassam Ali conspires to have John Storm meet the same fate as McWinter, and he and Storm are overcome by powerful fumes. Zudora saves them, proves that McWinter's own dog trapped and killed him, and saves Smith from a band of lynchers.

An inventor blows up a submarine with a powerful heat ray which he sends Zudora to a photographer directly beneath the inventor's laboratory and orders the inventor to kill her. Zudora gets a warning, and her life is saved. The heat ray machine is destroyed, and the photographer, after a quarrel with Hassam Ali, is found dead in the river.

Wu Chang prevents Zudora's elopement with John Storm by hypnotizing her, and he and Hassam Ali attempt to smuggle her out of the country. This plot is frustrated by Storm.

Baird, Hassam Ali's double, falls in love with Zudora. Baird and Mrs. Du Val kidnap Zudora and the Van Wick child. Storm rescues them, and Hassam Ali dies.

With Hassam Ali dead Zudora is released of her pledge to solve twenty cases. She confronts, however, the greatest mystery of all, which is the mystery of her own life, and the ambition to secure the vast fortune of $20,000,000 left to her. This great photo serial is being shown in the leading moving picture theaters by the Thanhouser Film Corporation. Among those participating are Marguerite Snow, Mary Elizabeth Forbes, James Cruze, and the new role of reporter-hero, Sidney Bracey and Frank Farrington.

On looking through her uncle's papers Zudora finds that her father left her an interest in a diamond mine, and Storm and Baird both lend assistance in trying to regain for her possession of this estate which is being appropriated by rogues under the leadership of Mme. Du Val. They plan to frighten Zudora so that she will run away. Failing, they kidnap Zudora and Howard, the mine superintendent, and put them in a private insane asylum. Howard dies, but Zudora, nearly finished, is rescued by Storm and his friends. Detecting Hunt and Baird find the Zudora gold mine.

CHAPTER XV.

The Robbery of the Ruby Coronet.

HUNT and Baird had at least found out where the Zudora mine was, but the rightful ownership still hung in the air. Hunt also declared that the false claimants had been cognizant of their trip to Montana and had tried to push them off the board. The best thing they now could do would be to wait for some fresh move against Zudora. Sooner or later they would make another attempt against her life or liberty. Hunt wanted both Zudora and Storm that if anything turned up of a suspicious character to notify him at once.

About this time Copeland, the bank and broker who had handled various deposits from Zudora and at whose bank she had her safety deposit box, concluded to make his wife a fine birthday gift. This gift was a handsome coronet of rubies. Mrs. Copeland possessed many splendid jewels, but this latest addition surpassed them all. Womanlike, she wanted to show her friends how generous her husband was, so she decided to give a dance. Among those who received invitations were Mme. Du Val, Captain Radcliffe and Bruce. Mrs. Copeland knew Mme. Du Val, but not the other two. They were business friends of her husband, and as such she accepted them.

Zudora and Storm were invited because Mrs. Copeland looked upon these two as friends. It had been some time since Zudora and Storm had gone to any social function, and naturally she was excited. She was in no wise in mourning for her uncle, the late Hassam Ali, but she had gone somewhere on weeks. The color and music would be a great relief to her. She had been sight. I've no idea that he has placed any word for it. Now, come along, I'm going to take a quiet stroll in the park. This house looks like good for one of these days."

"You would rob Copeland?" whispered Bruce.

"I would take the pennies off a dead man's eyes if I needed them. Come on."

The two worthies mounted the stairs casually, but once in the upper hall they became alert.

"I'll try this room here," said Radcliffe. "It looks as if it might be Mrs. Copeland's boudoir. Cough if any one comes in sight."

Radcliffe slipped into Mrs. Copeland's boudoir and glanced about with the skilled eye of a man who finds it necessary to observe all things. He saw the safe in the wall and examined it. That magnificent coronet and that collar of diamonds would repose in yonder safe. But it would be a hard nut to crack.

His glance swept over the top of the dresser and rested upon the little book. Such things were generally valuable. In a moment he was thumbing it. When he came across the combination he was delighted. He quickly transferred it to a slip of paper, stowed it away, and started for the door just as Bruce coughed his warning. He was safely in the hall by the time the maid came along.

"The gentlemen's coat room?" he asked.

"The door opposite, sir."

"Thanks," said Radcliffe. He and Bruce entered the coat room as a matter of precaution, then went downstairs again. Radcliffe would have been greatly astonished could he have glanced into Mrs. Copeland's boudoir ten minutes later. The butler, having ideas of his own, was at that moment copying down the combination of the wall safe from the little book the mistress had forgotten in her hurry.

Zudora and Storm, however, enjoyed themselves thoroughly. What with the music and the dancing and the pleasure they found in each other's company the rest of the world seemed very well lost. On the way home, however, Zudora expressed her dislike for Captain Radcliffe. She was quite positive that she had seen him before under unfavorable circumstances. She wondered if Copeland knew anything about the man.

"Where do you think you have seen him?" asked Storm curiously.

"That's the baffling part of it. I know I've seen him, but beyond that bracelets of diamonds. She scintillated, as the saying goes.

She kept her jewels in a small wall safe. She was giving her hair a few finishing puffs when the maid entered to announce that guests were arriving. Hastily the mistress replaced in the safe those trifles she could not use and shut the door. But in her hurry she left on the dresser a little book which contained the combination numbers.

The moment she was gone the maid pounced upon the book and thumbed it hurriedly. She had seen this little book many times, but until now she had never been able to get her hands upon it. She knew that it contained the combination of the wall safe. She replaced the book in the identical spot she had found it and left the room.

Baird was glad to see Zudora and Storm. He chatted with them until the dancing began, then he wandered out among the smokers.

Captain Radcliffe and Bruce present drew together.

"Did you see that fellow Baird?" asked Bruce.

"Yes, and he has his eye on me. But I don't think he connects me with the man he met on the road to the Zudora mines."

"Well, I want to keep out of his things are hazy. I don't like him. I'm certain of that much."

"I wish you'd marry me straight off and let me take you away where you'd forget all these unhappy affairs."

"Ah, John, my father was a sportsman. He never gave up a fight, and neither shall I. It isn't the money, though, that's always handy. It's the thought of dishonest people getting the benefit of what is mine. Until I've won or lost I prefer to remain as I am. I've caused you enough trouble, John, as it is. No one has any enmity toward you. It is I."

"Well, I guess I'll hang around," said John pleasantly, though he did not experience any particular pleasure at that moment. "You might change your mind, you know, and when you do I want to be at hand."

"You're very good to me, John."

"Millions and millions of money," he murmured. "I'm beginning to hate money."

"So am I. So let's say no more about it."

The following day, at Mme. Du Val's, plans were completed for the robbing of the Copeland wall safe. Bruce and Radcliffe agreed that the attempt should be made that night, as the Copelands had spoken of going into the city for a night at the opera. They sent two lesser crooks to watch the premises.

And while they watched they saw shadows against the curtains of Mrs. Copeland's room. At first they believed that the Copelands had not gone into town, but a minute or two later one of the shades rolled up, revealing the butler and the maid.

Mr. Hook had been butler in the Copeland house for about six weeks. He had been highly recommended by Marie, the maid, who had served her mistress with apparent loyalty for two years. All for the purpose that was now being enacted. Hook was merely her partner in crime, and both were wanted by the police in other cities.

The butler went directly to the safe in the wall, turned the knob the specified number of times, and swung open the door.

"There they are, Marie. This is the best job. We'll like a rest the pond and live in comfort for the rest of our days. I never could find any value in money. I kept that little book, and we both felt on it last night. Some luck, eh? Thirty thousand dollars, as easy as turning over your hand. Give me the handbag."

He dumped the jewels into the bag, but the ruby coronet was too large for the receptacle.

"I'll have to carry that under my coat. Now, then, give me a kiss and I'll be off to Hudon's saloon to hide the stuff. We'll have to split the swag three ways, but we'll pull down a clear $20,000, or I don't know our Uncle Isadore."

"Harry! I'll follow just as soon as I can."

"Tight-o! Now, to make it look real and lifelike, I'll drop out of the window here. I've a pair of the master's shoes on, and that'll bank the bulls until we can make a safe getaway."

He dropped, almost into the hands of the two men watching him. But he was too agile and quick for them. He was off like a deer. They gave chase heartily enough, rather certain that Captain Radcliffe would miss his bait if they did not catch this shrewd butler. Hook, by dodging and doubling, succeeded in eluding them. He had in mind to hide the jewels and return some other night for them. He wasn't anxious to have them fall into the hands of absolute strangers. That they were in the same deal as himself he had no doubts.

He drew out his handkerchief to wipe around the receptacle, and in doing so the memorandum book and a card fell from his pocket. Mr. Hook was not wholly fortunate in his adventure this night. As he sealed the wall and dropped down the other side of it he dropped into Bruce's arms. Bruce had heard the tramping of feet and was ready. In the struggle the coronet fell to the ground. With a mighty jerk Hook managed to free himself, and he took to his heels, glad enough to have some of the booty.

Bruce had a keen ear, and during the struggle he heard something fall. Immediately he began searching, and finally came upon the coronet. On the other side of the wall somewhere lurked his amiable confederate, Captain Radcliffe. Should he call him and make known his find? Indeed no. There was honor among thieves in books, but rarely in life. Bruce stole off the scene, perfectly satisfied with his share of the loot.

But Captain Radcliffe found something. It was the card the crooked butler had dropped during his struggle with Bruce. Did Captain Radcliffe call aloud for his friend, Bruce? No. He was stirred by the same sense. This saloon in Ramona avenue was doubtless some kind of a fence, and he at once decided to investigate.

This Man Wants a Majestic Range

Is through with buying of Chicago Mail Order Houses. His experience has been the same as many others who have been stung in the same manner. Read what he says about the Majestic.

Dear Sir:

Send me the price list of the Majestic Ranges and the name of the firm who handles them in Charlevoix county.

I moved to Charlevoix the first of March and bought a cast range from Montgomery Ward.

But the range is not very satisfactory so I will have to dispose of it to someone, and would like to get a Majestic.

Hoping to hear from you soon, I remain,

Respectfully yours,

AXEL TULANE.

Charlevoix, R. F. D. No. 3.

This man, along with hundreds of others has come to the conclusion that mail order ranges are no good, and pledges his faith in the Majestic. He knew the Majestic, and for this reason, wants to buy another. This is the sentiment expressed by 99 out of a hundred Majestic users. It is the stove that gives universal satisfaction, and the one you should buy when replacing the old, worn out range you are now using. Call at our store and see them.

Entered at Charlevoix Postoffice as second class matter.

ONE of the classic blunders of the present administration is now before the Court of Customs, Appeals, and a decision is looked for at an early date.

The court is expected to interpret the meaning of the provision in the Underwood tariff bill, proposing to give a five per cent discount in customs duties on merchandise imported in American vessels. Thus far that clause has failed in its purpose, just as the tariff measure of which it is a part failed to provide adequate revenue.

Enacted October 13, 1913, it failed on its first test, and that test applied, too, by the then attorney general less than 30 days after the bill was signed.

No sooner had the tariff bill been presented to the secretary of the treasury for administration than a doubt arose in his mind as to the validity of the five per cent discount provisions. He appealed for advice to Attorney General Reynolds, who is now on the supreme court bench. The provision was pronounced inoperative.

"The five per cent discount to American vessels cannot be given," is the language of the attorney general quoted by the secretary. "Without impairing the stipulations of existing treaties between the United States and various other powers, and consequently the subjection is inoperative."

Acting on this opinion the secretary of the treasury issued an order to customs collectors, instructing them to make no allowance of discount on duties under this provision.

Importers who had relied on the law appealed to the board of general appraisers. Their ruling resulted in further confusion, and neither side satisfied, the case was taken to the court of customs appeals, more than a year after the law had passed.

The Democratic committee report on the five per cent defined it as "a discrimination in favor of American shipping, designed to build up our merchant marine and keep at home millions of dollars now being paid to foreign vessels to carry products to foreign markets."

Yet although they fully realized the tremendous importance of this measure which they said involved millions of dollars, they lacked the foresight to consult their own attorney general as to the possibility of enacting it into law. They had a vague idea of what they wanted, adopted a vague method of trying to secure it, and by careless guess work threw the whole matter into the courts.

Furthermore even if the principle of discrimination had not been questioned by the attorney general, the provision was so clumsily drafted that three different interpretations have been placed upon it. Counsel for the importers claimed one interpretation, government attorneys claimed another, and the board of general appraisers furnish a third different from all.

During the debate in congress on this provision, Republican members repeatedly warned the Democrats that, quite apart from its policy, its phraseology was meaningless and should be corrected to become effective.

It was so much breath wasted. The majority stubbornly refused to accept either caution, suggestion or amendment. The result has been that this very important clause has thus far proven mere useless verbiage, except to cause litigation and expense to all concerned. About the only purpose it has served is to emphasize the fact that the inefficient methods of Democratic legislators have made it impossible for them to put even their own ideas into effect.

A negro mammy had a family of boys so well behaved that one day her mistress asked: "Sally, how did you raise your boys so well?" "Ah'll tell you, missus," answered Sally. "Ah raise dem boys wid a barrel stave, an' ah raise 'em frequent."

A country newspaper editor once noticed in an exchange the proud announcement that "Cadillac has a girl who kneads bread with her gloves on." "That's nothing," commented the editor, "we need bread with our gloves on and our gloves off. In fact, if some of our subscribers don't pay up pretty soon, we'll need bread without a thing on."

At the close of his talk before a Sunday school the bishop invited questions. A tiny boy, with white, eager face, at once held up his hand. "Please sir," said he, "why was Adam never a baby?" The good bishop coughed in doubt as to what answer to give, but a little girl, the eldest of several brothers and sisters, came promptly to his aid. "Please sir," there was nobody to nuss him."

"Ah," said the superintendent, "and here is Tommy Goodboy's missionary offering, $25.60. That will make some little henthens heart glad. Now tell us how you got this money, Tommy." "Yes, sir," said Tommy, like the good boy he was, "part of it pa won playing poker, some of it ma won on a crazy quilt raffle, some of it sister Laura won playing progressive eucher, $2 brother Bill won on a horse race, 20 cents I got for marbles I won playing for keeps, and the rest I won at a grab bag and a prize at the church fair." After a brief consultation, the brethren decided that they would forward the money to the heathen but wouldn't tell them how it was raked in. There are some things that it is not best for the heathen to know.

MILITARY ARCHERS.

Bows and Arrows Were Used in Battle Up to a Century Ago.

We think of the bow and arrow as medieval weapons of war abandoned by the nations of Europe four or five centuries ago. The bowmen of Crete are the last of any prominence in English history. Yet it is only about 100 years since soldiers fought with bows and arrows in European wars, and that, too, on the fields of southern Belgium.

It was in 1813, when all Europe was armed against Napoleon. Every one of the allied nations brought every possible resource of men and means to further this end. Among them was Russia. To the war she sent soldiers from the newly conquered tribes that dwelt upon the steppes of Asia—Bokharans and Turkomans and Tartars and other half savage peoples. Many of these regiments were armed with bows and arrows.

Jomini, the military historian, speaks of a great number of these that fought side by side with the Prussians in eastern Germany and in Belgium, and he says that these bowmen held their own against the French Infantry. Their aim, he says, was surprisingly good, and they could shoot an arrow with effect almost as far as a musket ball was effective, but in those days that was not much more than 100 yards.—Exchange

THE ART OF MUSIC.

One Must Thoroughly Understand It to Really Enjoy It.

Berlioz says: "Music is the art of moving, by a systematic combination of sounds, the affections of intelligent, receptive and cultivated beings."

Weber states: "Music is to the arts what love is to man. In truth, it is love itself; the purest, loftiest language of passion, portraying it in a thousand shades of color and feeling."

Ruskin declares: "Music is the first, the simplest, the most effective of all instruments of moral instruction."

Have you ever thought what a desolate place the world would be without music? Have you ever realized that the entire civilized world now looks upon music as one of the great essentials in the education of the cultured man and woman?

Few persons know that the greatest delight of music comes through the understanding of it. The highest in music is not revealed to the student until the student has earned the right to enjoy it. With the right one earned the student has a wonderful power at his command, a power with which he can carry his listeners to the height of joy or to the depth of sadness. With music it is possible to exercise control over all the emotions of man—Alfred Edward Frockton Jr., in New York Tribune.

How He Looked.

One summer when William M. Ex arts was at his country home in Windsor, Vt., a farmer who had followed his political career in the newspapers for many years was extremely anxious to see him in the flesh and drove eight miles into town in order to catch a glimpse of his idol.

Senator Evans at that time was being entertained constantly, dining out almost every night, and as he drove out of his grounds to an appointment one evening the farmer was lying in wait for him in the road. The latter, seeing the pale, ascetic and meager form of the famous statesman, was disappointed.

"Well, I declare," he exclaimed, "looks as if he'd always boarded!"

"When I started out in life," said Mr. Dusty Stax, "I was full of idealistic theories. I was determined that I would never take an unfair advantage of any man."

"But you had to sacrifice some of your ideals," suggested Miss Cayenne. "Oh, yes. A man must be practical, you know. I have reached a point where I can afford to be indifferent to criticism. I began at the bottom and worked my way up."

"Perhaps. But are you sure you didn't begin at the top and slide down?"—Washington Star

AUTOMOBILE INSPECTION.

Parts That Should Be Carefully Examined Twice a Month.

The best system in going over a car thoroughly is to have a regular semi-monthly inspection day, says Automobile Dealer and Repairer. There are eight main items which should be gone over thoroughly in this semi-monthly inspection.

First.—Test the compression of the cylinders. Inspect the motor thoroughly for possible compression leakage around the inlet and exhaust valves.

Second.—Go over the ignition system thoroughly. Examine all of the wiring, terminals and spark plugs. See that all connections are tight and that there are no defects in the insulation to cause short circuits.

Third.—Examine the water circulation, be sure that there are no leaks about the pump and its connections. See that the fan is operating perfectly and that the fan belt is tight. See that there are no leaks about the water connections of the carburetor.

Fourth.—Give particular attention to the gear shifting mechanism. See that all the gears move freely and that there is no possibility of their failure to work in an emergency.

Fifth.—Look to the brake adjustment. It is most essential to the safety of both car and passengers that the brakes work well. Examine both sets of brakes and be sure that they pull equally. You want to keep the brakes sufficiently tight to stop the car readily, but you also want to be sure that they do not drag. Dragging brakes reduce the pulling power of the motor, causing squeaks and of course wearing out the brake lining rapidly.

Sixth.—Thoroughly inspect all of the steering connections for loose nuts and bolts. Do not take any chances with the steering gear.

Seventh.—Tighten up all spring clips and be sure that the spring bolts and hangers are not loose. Examine the rear spring perches and make sure that they are free to move on the axle housing.

Eighth.—Go over the body and chassis and thoroughly tighten all bolts.

SAFETY MINE LAMP.

English Invention Gives Warning of Presence of Firedamp.

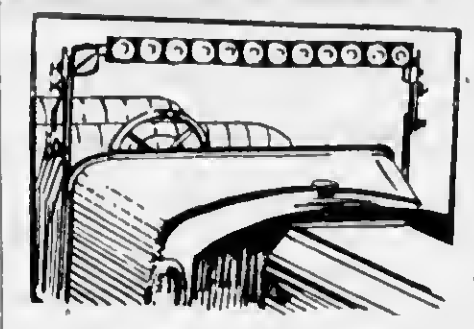

An apparatus which may prove of great value to coal mines has been invented recently by a resident of London, according to Deputy Consul General Hopley Wilson.

The invention, which is called the Williams fire damp indicator, or methanometer, is a detector of the dangerous hydrocarbon fire damp, a gas responsible for many serious explosions in coal mines. The apparatus is made in two parts. One part is a very sensitive instrument which responds quickly when fire damp is present; the other part is a dial indicator which shows the exact percentage of methane in the atmosphere. The detector and indicator may be placed side by side, enabling the miners themselves to know by what percentage of fire damp they are surrounded, or the indicator may be placed at any convenient center. The connection between the two parts of the instrument is electric. By either one of these methods a series of instruments posted in various parts of the workings forms a safeguard hitherto unknown.

When smoothing boards with sandpaper the usual method is to wrap the paper around a block so that a better grip for the hand may be had and in the same time covering the surface more evenly than could be accomplished without it. On uneven work the block would only touch the high spots, and for this reason it is better to use a block of soft rubber about five inches long, three inches wide and one and one-half inches thick. Its surface is yielding, and with the pressure of the hands it forces the sandpaper into the low parts and smooths them as well.

Portuguese Tungsten.

The greatest deposit of wolframite, the mineral from which tungsten is obtained, that is now worked is said to be at Pansqueira, Portugal. The deposit covers an area of four by two miles, in which there are at least twenty-five reefs of wolfram bearing quartz. Although the mine has been worked for many years, it always produces the same quality of mineral.

On second thought the maid concluded not to fly at present, but to announce the robbery the moment the Copelands returned. For awhile at least they would not suspect her of complicity. Nor did they. The maid wept. The butler was evidently giddy. And she had trusted him. She had even promised to marry him. He was a thief. It was all so very well done that the Copelands believed her implicitly.

Meantime Bruce wended his way quickly to a house he knew of. It was a rendezvous of his own not known by his confederates. In the library over the mantel hung a fine pair of antlers. These covered a hole in the brick chimney, and into this hole Bruce deposited the ruby coronet. He could wait now until the whole affair had blown over. On one of his European trips he could dispose of it for far more than he could safely get in America. He was well satisfied with himself.

The next day Detective Hunt learned of the robbery, but as he had not yet been approached in regard to it merely made note of the salient features of the case. He busied himself with several photographs and selected one of them. Later he would use this likeness as a disguise.

Bold came in breezily. "They're put me on the Copeland robbery," he announced. "What do you think about it?"

"I guess the butler is the boy." "If I can find a soap in this story my little old party envelope will get a boost."

"You're a queer card, Bald. You've got the stuff in you. You once lived like a prince, and yet you're willing to work hard for an honest living. Well, if the Copelands come in line I'll take you in on it."

"Any news on the other business?" "Nothing you can put your hand on. I have a lot of suspicions, but I'm not going to tell you what they are. I wish I'd been at the Copelands the other night. There might have been a face there I could have placed."

The clerk came in. "Lady and gentleman to see you, sir."

"Name?" "Copeland."

"Send them in," said Hunt, smiling. "I've an idea our friend Storm sent them here. Don't do any talking."

"All right," laughed Bald.

The visitor of the visit resulted in Hunt accepting the case. He went up to the house at once and went over the ground thoroughly. He quizzed the maid narrowly, but she was letter perfect in her part. She fooled him and disarmed him apparently, but he took careful notice of her features and her height and color. There were tracks all over the lawn—so many, in fact, that he could hear nothing in this direction.

That afternoon Mr. Hook entered the grogshop of Mr. Rodon, greeted the barkeeper cordially, and proceeded upstairs to a room he had previously engaged. There he met the maid Marie and had laughed over the successful robbery in which the detective had been fooled.

Downstairs Captain Radcliffe entered the bar, sat down by a window and ordered a drink, pretending to be interested in that morning's paper. Sooner or later he expected to encounter Mr. Hook. The captain had a good deal of patience when necessity required it.

Now, one thing Detective Hunt did find, and that was Hook's own memorandum book. In that book he learned that the butler's "hangout" was Rodon's saloon in Rhinona avenue, Bronx. So at the same time that Radcliffe read his newspaper and Hook dined with the maid upstairs, Hunt and Bald stopped on the opposite side of the street and eyed the name on the saloon windows.

"This is the shop, sure enough," declared Hunt. "Suppose we stroll over and see what's inside."

Radcliffe chanced to look out of a clear spot in the window and saw them. He was in a quandary for a moment. But he had his worry for nothing. The detective and the reporter immediately sought the stairs, and Captain Radcliffe, as he went out the rear door, cursed himself for not going up the stairs himself.

There's always a slip 'twixt the cup and the lip. If Marie hadn't wanted a certain brooch which she admired among the Copeland collection and if Hook hadn't strenuously refused to surrender it, they would not have quarreled, their voices would not have risen. The sound of their argument was music to Hunt's ears. Quickly he selected a key from his bunch of skeletons, whipped it into the lock, gave a twist, and shouldered into the room, followed by Bald.

Hook, without waiting to inquire his visitors' names and business, plunged toward a window and leaped. Bald followed him fearlessly.

Hunt turned upon the maid sardoniously.

"I thought I'd find you here." He scooped up the stolen jewels. "Where is the ruby coronet?"

"I don't know," whimpered Marie.

"He lost it in jumping the wall the night of the robbery."

Hunt did not doubt this. The tracks in the Copeland place had given evidence of a struggle.

"Where is his hangout?" he demanded.

"I don't know."

"All right," Hunt took out a pair of handcuffs. "Want to ride back to town with these on instead of diamonds?"

Marie reluctantly told him where he would doubtless find her lover. After all, if Hook hadn't made such a row about riding her what she wanted of the loot neither would have been in their predicament.

"It's the old Blaisdell house at Highwood."

"Go back to your mistress and stay there. I can't find your phiz anywhere, so I'm going to give you a chance. But if you're lied to me I'll put you over."

When Hunt reached the Blaisdell place he was met by Bald, more or less out of wind.

"Did you get them all?" "All but the ruby piece. I've an idea that it's in this joint. Where's Hook?"

"He got by me somehow. I shouldn't wonder if that old house had a dozen or more secret passages. But I couldn't find any. Let's get back to town with the stuff. We can come back here later."

When they did get back they encountered many thrilling things, as surprising as they were thrilling. Zudora and John had gone out for a spin, and the machine had broken down near the Blaisdell place. Bruce, who had witnessed the accident, made up for the occasion and offered the hospitality of his home. This courtesy was readily accepted, with the result that the two young people found themselves prisoners. Zudora was tied to a chair in the library, while Storm was dragged down into the cellar.

Bruce was in high feather. He had not only the rubies, but the girl they had been after ever since she got away from Dr. Mann's private lunatic asylum. But eggs have to be hatched before you can count your chickens.

Hunt and Bald returned at once after they had given the bag of jewels to Mrs. Copeland. They found Zudora, to their amazement, struggling in the Morris chair.

"The ruby coronet is behind those antlers," she cried. "They took John downstairs. Go to him quickly!"

So all the jewels—and perhaps the most precious, Zudora—were returned. But Hunt was distinctly dissatisfied with the adventure. The crooks had slipped through his fingers.

Mosquito Catchers.

Keep a duck and so avoid mosquitoes is the lesson of some experiments conducted by the Pennsylvania commissioner of health. Mosquitoes breed in stagnant or quiet water, and the duck will greedily gobble the mosquito pupae and larvae. For breeding grounds some kinds of mosquitoes prefer the stagnant water in a clogged gutter or a tin can in the back yard, and of course the duck cannot be expected to attend to that breed. The duck, however, will attend to all the baby mosquitoes that appear in any pool of water near the house, which otherwise would make themselves a nuisance round the house. The experiments consisted of building two pools—one for ducks and one for fish—and finding out in which pool the mosquitoes would breed. Goldfish did not seem to interfere with the mosquito households at all in their pond, but twenty mallard ducks kept their pool free. Later, ten of the ducks were placed in the fish pond, and they cleaned up the swarms of pupae and larvae in a few hours. Other experiments have found that some kinds of fish will eat the baby mosquitoes, so that fish have been recommended as a protection, but this test gives complete assurance that the mallard duck will do the work.—Saturday Evening Post.

What They Could Do.

THE VALUE OF A TRADE-MARK.

The value of a trademark is obvious to manufacturer and consumer alike. It offers the manufacturer protection for his product, and it is

Trade Mark very often a warranty to consumers that he gets a superior article for his money. One will readily understand that it would not be profitable—it would not pay to put a trademark article on the market and then pay no attention to the quality of the article. Trade-marked immense sums of money are expended for advertising and otherwise exploiting trade-marked and copyrighted goods and where the article so protected has real merit the consumer learns to have confidence in the trademark, asks for goods so advertised at store or factory, and is determined to have them and will not be turned from his purpose when imitations are offered him or he is told that "there is something just as good." He has become familiar with the trademark of the goods that he wants, is convinced that the article is of superior quality and insists upon having it.

The Rouse Rex Shoes, manufactured and sold in our own state, might be mentioned as a case in point. Buyers have learned to look for the familiar trademark of an Indian head stamped conspicuously on the sole of every Rouse Rex Shoe, knowing by experience that they will be found uniformly good.

King David's Trying Experiences—The Cave of Adullam—King David's Nephews—Water From Bethlehem. David Twice Spared King Saul's Life. Lessons of the Hour.

"Love your enemies, do good to them that hate you."—Luke 6:27.

OUTLAWED and hunted by King Saul, David was joined by unfortunate outcasts from society, and soon found himself at the head of a company of about four hundred men, more or less armed. It was a great training for his future kingdom work. Amongst these were three of David's nephews. One was Jonathan, who became captain of the host. Ahishai and Asahel were the others, who afterwards became renowned.

For a time David and his company occupied the cave of Adullam. It is greatly to his credit that he refused to plunge his nation into civil war, as he would have been abundantly able to do. But he remembered that the Lord, through the Prophet Samuel, had anointed him to be king; and that it was for him to abide God's time.

It was because David was thus full of faith in God and possessed the spirit of obedience to Him that he was called a man after God's own heart—not that he was perfect, but that the Lord's will was his real heart's desire, and whenever through weakness he took a different course, he promptly repented on seeing the mistake, implored Divine forgiveness and changed his course.

While sojourning at the cave of Adullam, David, in a fit of homesickness, referred to the fine well-water of his Bethlehem home, lamenting how much he would relish it. Thereupon three of his followers undertook the perilous journey, unknown to David. They were outlaws, and Bethlehem was in the hands of the Philistines; yet these brave men obtained a water-skin from the favored well. When they presented it to David, he declared that the water was gotten at too great a cost to be lightly used. Then he poured it upon the earth as a sacrifice of thanksgiving to the Lord for the blessings they enjoyed and for the support of such loyal associates. Surely David's devotion to the Lord and his faith were well manifested!

Training For Kingdom Work.

When David and his followers were at Nob, Ahimelech the priest showed him kindness. King Saul, learning of this through a spy, slaughtered the priests of that place and their lineage. This brought to David one of Ahimelech's sons with the priestly ephod. A prophet had also joined David. All this convinced King Saul the more that God's favor was departed from him. Nevertheless, he continued to fight against the Davidic Program.

On one occasion David and his company were occupying a cave on the west side of the Dead Sea, when King Saul and his men entered the cave for rest and refreshment. David and his associates were further back in the cave; and when Saul's company entered, David's band desired that Saul be killed, that thus their trying experiences might be ended. But David would not consent. However, he cut a piece from Saul's robe as a demonstration that he could have killed the king had he been disposed.

After the king and his company had gone a certain distance, David and his men showed themselves and protested that Saul was not appreciative of their loyalty and sought their lives when they would not take his. Saul's better nature was aroused; and he wept, saying, "Thou art more righteous than I." For the time the hunting of David was abandoned. Nevertheless, there was a similar experience later.

On this occasion, David and his nephew entered Saul's camp and took from beside his head his spear and his water-bottle. Then from an opposite hill, a ravine between, David pointed out to the king that he was not only more vigilant than Saul's soldiers, but more loyal to the king's interests; and that to pursue him was a mistake.

A Profitable Lesson.

David's examination of his unwillingness to take his enemy's life was that Saul's was the Lord's anointed, and that to assault the king was to attack the Almighty's arrangements. This he could not conscientiously do. "Touch not mine anointed."

It is well to have this principle in mind. We are not to think of the kings of today as the Lord's anointed, however. They are their own anointed. Their kingdoms are kingdoms of this world. On the contrary, Israel was God's special kingdom, under a special covenant arrangement. By Divine authority King Saul had been anointed with the special anointing oil, typifying the Holy Spirit. David's anointing with the same oil was not to give him a right to interfere with the Lord's anointing previously accomplished in Saul, but to assure him that he was to be Saul's successor.

"THE LAST LAUGH."

An article under this above caption has been going the rounds of the press. It recalls William Allen White's story, "What's the Matter With Kansas?" published some time since in the Saturday Evening Post.

"Mr. White," it said, "boasted about the big crops of Kansas, the per capita wealth of Kansas, the number of automobiles in Kansas, and almost succeeded in making everyone believe that Kansas was wholly rich as well as richly holy. But his overdid it. And his home town, Emporia, is the goat. For years the College of Emporia has been largely supported by means of donations from wealthy Easterners, who imagined they were assisting a poor little college on the wind-swept prairies. When these rich patrons read Mr. White's clever but misleading article they withdrew their subscriptions. This year the college must look to home for the annual donation of $200,000, which used to come out of the East."

The National W. C. T. U. Bureau of Publicity forwarded the article to Mr. White and in reply he says:

"I have received, I should say, a dozen or fifteen clippings from all over the United States exactly like the one you sent. The clippings were sent out by the liquor interests through the National Clipping Bureau, and there is no truth whatever in the statement. It is pure fiction."

Mr. White adds also the following statement written for the public by the president of the college:

"TO WHOM IT MAY CONCERN: I have learned that certain selfish interests are circulating a story that the College of Emporia has lost donations and subscriptions in the East, due to an article in The Saturday Evening Post on the prohibition situation in Kansas, written by William Allen White. I wish to say there is absolutely no foundation for this story."

"Very truly yours,

"HENRY COE CULBERTSON, President College of Emporia."

In a personal letter to Mr. White, a copy of which is also in the hands of the W. C. T. U. Publicity Bureau, Mr. Culbertson deals with the college financial affairs in detail. We quote:

"The article to which you call my attention is utterly absurd. Neither the College of Emporia nor Washburn college ever received 'an annual donation of $200,000' from the East. So far as I can ascertain, during the entire thirty-two years' existence of the College of Emporia, this institution has not received as much as $65,000 in all, for all purposes, buildings, endowment and current expenses, from persons living outside the state. This is an average of about two thousand dollars per year. Almost all of our endowment, and the money to erect our buildings, as well as the money to meet our current expense budget of $40,000 per year, has come from the gifts of the people to this prohibition state of Kansas."

Even if it cost us $200,000 or any other amount in possible gifts, our faculty, officers and trustees would still endorse most emphatically the prohibition policy, which we believe involves the moral and social welfare of our state and nation."

TEMPERANCE INSURANCE.

"It may interest abstainers to know," says the Temperance Leader, "that in 1840 an application was received by an English insurance company for a policy on the life of an abstainer, and the directors of the company decided to charge ten per cent. more than the ordinary premium, because they looked upon the applicant as thin and watery, and as mentally cranked in that he regulated the good creatures of God as found in alcoholic drinks. As the result of this action, he, with his friends, founded the first temperance insurance company in Britain, and himself lived to the age of eighty-two."

LIQUOR REVENUE NOT NEEDED.

"Only last year there was expended in Raleigh for the construction of residences, business institutions and public buildings the stupendous sum of $1,459,221," declared Hon. M. L. Shipman, commissioner of Inland for North Carolina, in a recent address. "And the beauty of it all is that not a dollar of this money was realized from either the sale or manufacture of intoxicating liquors. I am informed that the loss of revenue formerly received from the dispensary once in operation here has long since been counteracted by a legitimate increase of taxable values."

SALOONS ARE MISSING.

If we could construct our own railroad, we could today enjoy a journey from old Virginia on the Atlantic to sunny California on the far Pacific without passing through an inch of territory where the saloon is legalized.—Anna A

Grange Column

Marion Center Grange.

Marion Center Grange, No. 956, met with an attendance of 38 members and 12 visitors. All officers present but treasurer. One candidate was instructed in the third and fourth degrees. The lecturer's hour consisted of readings and recitations. Next meeting there will be a discussion on selecting seed potatoes. Grange closed to meet again in two weeks.

Harmony Grange.

Our last meeting was well attended, and an interesting program carried out, among the features of which was roll call, in answer to which each member gave a current event.

Considerable time was given to the discussion of the question "Shall we build a hall this year, and if so, what size and what material?" The matter was left to the members to present plans at the next meeting.

A discussion on the "Profits in Poultry" was led by H. M. Willson, a breeder for a number of years of Rose Comb R. I. Reds. He has found profit in sticking to one breed and giving them good care, exercise and a variety of feed.

The Woman's Work Com. met with Sister Marcia Burdick last Thursday, reporting a good attendance and much work done.

Several members ordered seeds from the Grange contract firm.

Trade committee read a list of contract firms at the last meeting, and no doubt many will take advantage of the terms offered.

The lecturer promised a good program for next meeting, May 15.

Brothers J. A. Newville and Charles Brooks attended Pomona Grange at Maple Grove and report a fine time.

HOW EFFECTIVELY TO PRE-SERVE THE BRIDE'S BOUQUET.

Many years ago it was quite the fashion to save a part of the bride's bouquet, press the flowers and arrange them carefully, frame and hang them on the wall. Later, when wax flowers were introduced, the entire bouquet was sometimes reproduced in wax and placed under a glass case.

The wax flowers were somewhat more natural looking than the dried ones, as they did not fade or lose their color, but it was necessary to use extreme care in moving either the frame of dried flowers or the case of wax ones, as they were easily broken.

The twentieth century has introduced a custom much more lovely than those of the past. If the bride's bouquet is of roses, take several and plant them. If cut roses are used for decoration at the wedding or reception, the petals might be saved to make a rose pillow for the bride.

One method of slipping roses in: Place the stems in water for a day or two; then plant in either sandy soil. Place a glass jar over the little slip and press it down in the soil, so that it will be quite firm. This forms a miniature hothouse for the slip.

If the weather is too cold to plant the slip out of doors plant it in a pot and keep it inside. Whether indoors or out, the glass should be kept over the slip until the plant grows too large for it.

The Playwright of St. Petersburg

A Story of the Russian Revolution

By EUNICE BLAKE

The chief of police in St. Petersburg called one of his most efficient men into his private office and said to him: "Vronsky, there is a plot hatching to assassinate the grand duke. We have but a trifle of information about it, but on what we have we must build the rest. To do this we need to proceed with the utmost caution. The name of Peter Alexandrovitch has been given us, but merely as a suspect. I wish you to set a watch upon him, note who goes to see him and whom he goes to see. Intercept his mail, but do not retain it. After having examined it reveal it and pass it on, but be careful to leave no traces of having opened it."

The chief then gave his deputy the address of the suspected man and sent him forth on his work. Vronsky hired a room opposite Alexandrovitch's house. Alexandrovitch's name was down on the police lists as a playwright. Every morning by 9 o'clock he was in his study, which was on the second floor, working at his plays. Vronsky, whose room was a story lower than the study, could only see the playwright's head, though his desk was close beside the window. Sometimes Alexandrovitch would move about the room or appear to shift something before him on his desk, but Vronsky could not see what he was doing, only that he was in motion. At other times Alexandrovitch would sit perfectly still, his eyes bent down on his desk without the slightest movement. Vronsky could understand why he should move about the room or at his desk, but not why he should laying down what is called the scenario—that is, the story. Some playwrights use dummy figures on a miniature stage while making the scenario, and when they have finished it they write the dialogue. It was suggested to Vronsky that Alexandrovitch when moving at his desk was making his scenario and when still was engaged in writing the dialogue of his plays.

Vronsky gave orders at the postoffice that Alexandrovitch's mail be returned for examination. A letter thus intercepted contained a statement for several days on the scenario of a play and that he would spend the balance of the week in putting in the dialogue. The waiter had noticed that his man had been active at his desk, and for the next few days he was remarkably quiet, sitting for hours at a time without apparent motion, though several times he turned his head from the window. On each of these occasions the motion was followed by a lady coming to the window to change the curtain to let in or cut off light, as required.

It did not seem to Vronsky that there was any doubt that Alexandrovitch was, during the day at least, following his vocation as playwright. But this had nothing to do with any secret work he might be doing. Besides the official, having been ordered to watch the suspect, remained at his post. One day he was sent for by his chief, who asked him if he had seen Alexandrovitch the day before.

"I did," was the reply. "He sat writing at a window of his house most of the day."

"Are you sure?"

"I saw him with my eyes."

The chief looked puzzled. "I have information that he was seen in Moscow yesterday," he said. "He was disguised, but was recognized through his disguise."

"Then he must have been in two places at once."

"Did you see him about noon?"

"I did. When I went to dinner he was writing at his desk."

"Hm!"

"Was he seen in Moscow at that hour?"

"My informant reports that he saw him there."

"Can you rely on your informant?"

"That is the question. We never know when we hire a spy that he does not offer our service for the purpose of gaining information for the revolutionists."

"Do you doubt that I am true to his majesty's interests?"

"I have perfect confidence in you."

"Then have a care how you tell your secrets to whoever has told you that he saw Peter Alexandrovitch in Moscow yesterday. I swear to you that just before I went to dinner yesterday—I got at half past 12—I saw a lady, likely the suspect's wife, come to the window, pull the shade partly down—for the sun had come around to shine in at the window—then turn, put her arms around his neck and kiss him. I left them in that position."

The chief seemed greatly perplexed. After some thought he asked:

"Does Alexandrovitch go out often?"

"No; he goes out very seldom. He seems to be very busy. I have intercepted several letters addressed to him from managers asking why he had not finished work he is doing for them and letters from him to parties saying that he cannot at present contract to do any more work, since he is unable to finish what he has in hand."

"Have you come near him?"

"Yes. One afternoon when he went out I followed him, as I always do when he leaves his home. He walked a short distance, then turned suddenly and passed me as near as I am to you. He went back to his house and in a few minutes came out again with a package in his hand for the post, which he appeared to have forgotten. I possessed myself of it and found a play which, I judged, he had been revising."

"You had better make some excuse to enter his house and see him there. But be careful that he does not suspect you to be shadowing him for the government. That will do. You may go."

The next day Vronsky, wearing the badge of a building inspector, went into Alexandrovitch's house, pretending that work was being done on a sewer beneath it and he wished to examine the walls to see if they were cracked. He saw the playwright sitting at his desk with a number of chess men before him, each piece bearing a label. They were set on a piece of cardboard, on which was drawn the outline of a stage. Alexandrovitch was reading from some manuscript before him and now and again would move one of the pieces off or on the stage.

The next afternoon Vronsky went to his chief and reported that he had been in the suspect's house and seen him working on a play.

"Have you seen him today?" asked the chief.

"Yes. He was sitting quietly at his window writing and smoking, as he often does when at work. Why do you ask?"

"Because I have just received a telegram that he is in Moscow."

The speaker looked Vronsky a dispassionate which he read with every evidence of surprise.

"Whose signature is this?" he asked.

"One whom I trust as implicitly as I trust you."

"But may he not be mistaken in the person?"

"He is never mistaken. He is the best sleuth in the government service."

"I will go at once to Alexandrovitch's house, enter it and see with my own eyes that he is there."

"Wait a moment."

A telegram was held before the chief who took it up, tore off the cover and read:

The grand duke has been assassinated by a bomb.

It required some time before the recipient of this important news could recover from the shock. Then he said: "Go! Enter the house of Alexandrovitch immediately, go to his study and put your hand on him and let me know the result at once."

Vronsky darted out of the office and in a few minutes was at Alexandrovitch's house. He attempted to open the door, but found it locked. He listened for a moment, but heard no sound. Something told him that the place was deserted. He ran across the street and looked up at the study window. There sat the playwright at his work. Vronsky ran back and hammered at the door loud enough to be heard in any part of the house.

No response.

Smashing a window, Vronsky effected an entrance and ran upstairs. He found no one and made his way unopposed to the study. Alexandrovitch was at his desk, but took no notice of the intruder. Vronsky went up to him, put his hand on his shoulder, and knew that the figure was hunched.

A further examination revealed the fact that it was of straw, the face wax. The head was set on a pivot and could be turned by pulling on a cord.

Vronsky ran back to his chief and reported how he had been deceived. He was informed that government officials in Moscow had discovered that Alexandrovitch was the leader of the conspiracy that had resulted in the grand duke's death. He had contrived to keep the attention of the St. Petersburg police fixed on him in the capital by means of the dummy while he was spending enough of his time in Moscow, disguised, to direct the operations. But he had made good his escape.

C. H. S. WON IN SPELLING CONTEST

Which Has Been Held in County During Past Twelve Weeks.

East Jordan Wins Second Place with Boyne, City Third—Local Students Worked Hard.

Charlevoix High 98.70.
East Jordan High 98.66.
Boyne City High 98.50.

It was with unmitigated joy and exultation that Charlevoix High school celebrated last Friday afternoon with a half day let off from the excruciating tortures of the last day of the week. And all the noise and comment that was aroused from the presence of the high school students was in affect similar to the sunshine after the rain. Charlevoix High, had won the county spelling contest after twelve weeks of strenuous labor and hair raising uncertainty. The above analysis of the twelve weeks work justifies all previous experience in the galaing thereof.

On February 10, Boyne City, East Jordan and Charlevoix commenced a mental race. Heretofore everything was turned over to the physical side until conditions in the schools showed a lack of good spellers and on some of the easier words poor horse. One contest was held every week, each school sending twenty-five words in successive order. Long words, lean words, short words, catchy words, etc., filled the roster of the contest. For twelve weeks the schools worked their heads off, figuratively speaking, in the one all amazing desire to prove to the others that there was more intelligence in one community than another. Up until four weeks ago the contest was an uncertainty, but Boyne City took a sudden drop from her high average, and the outcome rested between East Jordan and Charlevoix.

In making a summary of the twelve contests, it is found that the local school received the "highest" weekly average of any of the three contestants, 99.82, and which virtually won first place. Charlevoix also led in the number of highest weekly averages. Out of the entire number of contests Charlevoix received seven weekly averages above 99 percentum. The lowest for the school was 96.32 which occurred the second week before the students really awakened to the fact that to win meant work.

East Jordan for the twelve weeks probably ran the most conservative and steady of the three schools. In very few instances did she go above 99 percent or below 98 percent. Boyne City received the lowest weekly average of the county, May 5, averaging 95.50.

Counting twenty-five words to the person for twelve weeks, Charlevoix spelled a total of 366,000 and 1220 students in the contest. Out of this total number of words only 401 were missed. East Jordan with 1231 students writing had a total of 339,300 words and missed 410. Boyne City missed 583 words out of a total 466,800 with 1556 students in the contest.

The contests, viewed from every angle, has proven one of the most interesting methods of securing more efficient work in everyday spelling and also for arousing school spirit, that the county has yet ventured to undertake. As is the case in every undertaking, a few remained on the out-side with their little hammers, but in looking around last Friday we found that those people enjoyed the relief from their studies with greater enthusiasm than those who put forth every effort that the school might come out on top.

Space is the only thing that stands in the way of publishing the names of those who received 100 percent for the twelve weeks contest. If the printers ink holds out another week it may be possible to send out the list.

OBSERVE PEACE DAY

Local Speakers Head Program at High School on Tuesday Morning.

Peace Day, Tuesday May 18, as set forth in a proclamation sent out by Governor Ferris was observed at the high school in an appropriate way. A scripture passage was read and invocation made by Rev. Quinton Walker, and the governor's proclamation also read to the school.

The speaker of the morning was R. W. Kane, president of the Board of Education, who, in a very forceful way with many illustrations laid before the boys and girls of Charlevoix High School the fundamentals of principles of peace.

Cupid on Strike; Year's Licenses Show Decrease

Dan Cupid is still behind his record of last year and the year before in Charlevoix. You can blame it on the Democrats, the war or the soaring price of edibles, but the fact remains that the chubby god of love is falling down on the job.

The records at the office of County Clerk Lewis show that during the month of April which recently ended but 12 marriage licenses were issued. The months of February and March were far short of this number. Last year during April 14 couples came into the office of the clerk for passes to matrimonial bliss or matrimonial storms, whichever might be the case.

During 1915, so far, 49 licenses have been issued, which will average higher than most of the months of the year. Upon going through the records it was found that the number of licenses issued per year had fallen off from 35 to 45 per year for the past four years.

CLOTHES BURNED FROM HER BODY

Sparks From Range Sets Fire to Clothes of Lucy Bacon.

Back Burned to a Crisp and Body and Arms Blistered in a Horrible Manner.

One of the most shocking accidents that has happened in this section for some time occurred at the home of Mr. and Mrs. C. A. Bacon, between 7 and 8 o'clock Tuesday morning.

Lucy, their 16-year-old daughter, was standing near the range, when a spark from the fire alighted on her skirts, and in a moment she was in a blaze from her knees to the top of her head. The frightened girl ran out doors screaming for help, closely followed by a smaller brother, who was making an effort to extinguish the flames. The girl ran some distance to where her father was working, and dropped to the ground, and the fire was put out by throwing on a pail of water.

She was taken into the house and the burned fragments of clothing taken from her. From her hips to her shoulders her back was burned to a crisp, and the front of her body burned and blistered in a horrible manner, as well as her arms and neck.

Medical assistance was immediately summoned and everything done to relieve the intense suffering she was undergoing. Physicians state that her burns are very deep, and the heat from the burning clothing had burned the flesh on her back to a hard crisp.

At the time of the accident, only the burned girl and a brother were at home, the father and mother being away at work.

Her condition is very serious, and even in case of recovery, she will be partially crippled for life.

HAD DELIGHTFUL EVENING

Home of Mrs. Tilton Scene of Happy Gathering Last Tuesday Evening.

On Tuesday evening of last week a number of Charlevoix ladies met at the home of Mrs. Ella Tilton, the occasion being a chop suey supper held in honor of Mrs. Wm. Campbell and Mrs. Maggie Lamphear, former Charlevoix residents, but now living in Flint.

The dining room was prettily decorated for the occasion in red and white, and red carnations were used as favors. From the merry peals of laughter which issued from the room while the supper was in progress, it was quite evident that the occasion was enjoyed by those present.

After supper was over, the remainder of the evening was spent in playing games and other amusements. One of the stunts of the evening, which we are told proved to be very amusing, was the passing of a paper among those present, each writing thereon a bit of advice as to the behaviour of Mesdames Campbell and Lamphear on their return to Flint. The writer could make a very interesting report of the event if it were possible to reproduce some of the advice written on these slips.

GAME WAS CLOSE

St. Mary's School Defeated by St. Anthony's of Mancelona Thursday.

St. Mary's School team was defeated last Thursday afternoon by St. Anthony's of Mancelona in a six inning game. The score was 17 to 15. Seven men were passed by Griffore, who pitched for the visiting team, to four by the locals. Only six hits were made by the visitors while four were passed.

Mancelona played tight in the beginning but loosened toward the end. Charlevoix played just the opposite, loose in the beginning and tight toward the last. Mancelona made thirteen runs in the first three innings to two by the locals. In the last three innings Charlevoix made thirteen runs to Mancelona four, but was unable to overcome the high lead held by Mancelona. Had three more innings been played most probably the score would have been greatly changed. Hyck of Charlevoix and R. Shepperle of Mancelona led the batters. Shepperle knocking a home run in the second inning with the bases full. Gallic did excellent work on first base for the visitors.

HARSHA HOME DAMAGED

Fire Saturday Night Results in Loss of Eight Hundred Dollars.

Fire which originated in the basement under the first place at the home of H. S. Harsha, Saturday night, damaged the beautiful residence, to the amount of $800.00.

During the supper hour members of the family noticed the smell of smoke in the rooms, but thought it came from the fire place. Shortly afterward smoke was noticed in the library, and upon going to the basement, it was found that fire had started from the ash pit under the fire place and spread to the floors on both the first and second floors.

The fire was a hard one to put out, having run between the walls and floors from the basement to the garret. A considerable amount of household furniture was removed, but the interior of the rooms in the north and west side of the house were badly damaged by smoke and water. The loss was fully covered by insurance.

The man who has had one fire experience is invariably a staunch advocate of fire insurance ever after. A valuable pointer to those who have not had such an experience. It will pay you to see Myrtle Young & Son. Adv. 201t

LACK ADEQUATE FIRE PROTECTION

Present Fire Fighting Equipment Needs Many Additions.

Citizens and Property Owners Should Demand That Ample Protection Be Given.

The fires in the city this spring have emphasized more than anything else that Charlevoix has not efficient facilities for fighting fires, and is in dire need of some immediate change. It is not inferred from this statement that the members of the department are individually inefficient. Far be it from such. Every department is efficient just so far as the facilities which it possesses allows it to be, and no department becomes more efficient without regular additions to the equipment and paraphernalia used in the performance of its duties.

Charlevoix needs to get to the front quickly an entire new equipment for the fighting of fires. A brand new, up-to-date modern department, employing modern methods and modern ideas. The person who criticizes the man who handles the nozzle because it doesn't drown the blaze, first should consider what facilities are offered the fireman. Look them over at the next fire. Here they are in detail. Old-fashioned two-wheeled hose carts, one for the north side, one for the south side and another at the central station. A few fairly good nozzles, a chemical apparatus but no ladders of up-to-date design. To add insult to this too, we have no means of getting this equipment to the scene of the fire except that which presents itself at the station when the bell rings.

The equipment which this city is able to afford and should have to apply protect its citizens and those who leave thousands of dollars here every summer, would consist of a fire team and modern hose wagon equipped with pre-ent day means to fight fire and save property. Besides this the city should also secure, to make the department an efficient one, a goodly supply of ladders and a wagon to carry these.

It should also set aside annually a sum of money to meet the expenses of the head of the department at the meeting of the State Firemen's Association, where he could become acquainted with present methods of stopping fires and bring them back to the city and put them into practice.

It is safe to state that there is no city in this part of the state of the importance of Charlevoix, so lacking in equipment for its fire department. Practically every city in the southern part of the commonwealth and many in this section have the equipment mentioned above, and the city pays for it, and the citizens are proud of the possession of it. Balky Cayuse Furnishes Amusement for Crowd Moves on Own Accord After Numerous Suggestions From Bystanders Fail to Start Him.

The day when the human race would run wild for blocks to view a threshing machine move majestically on its way has long passed into history. But not so with the balky horse. It will for always hold its place among the sights that amuse the populace.

The streets of Charlevoix were thrown into confusion last Saturday afternoon by the presence of one of the most suspicious affairs. Business for the time being was suspended to allow proprietors to view with amusement the behavior of the animal. Beautiful office blondes and typewriters craned and stretched their necks in an effort to add another touch of beauty to the landscape as they gazed from the windows "grinning" and squealing with the utmost joy. Stately matrons move impressively down the street to swell the audience. Members of the aboriginal race, commonly known as Indians now-a-days, looked on with that silent smile, overcome with laughter. Telephone poles, tops of buildings, guy wires, and in fact everything that could hold another human being were occupied. Oh, yes, we forgot to mention the police force. Was in evidence, but could add nothing more amusing to the situation. Isn't it peculiar what enjoyment one can get out of a balky horse provided he remains in neutral zones.

But to come to the point after explaining the setting: The presence of a balky horse in the streets of Charlevoix was in truth a most serious situation. Here in the middle of the main thoroughfare of one of the most up-to-date summer resort towns of the commonwealth, for a horse, a measly mustang of young years, to have the nerve to remain stationary, as it were, was even too serious to even think about.

But nevertheless there he stood on all fours, part of the time on all three the rest of the time, peacefully eying his mustang head and daring, really daring, for any one to come within leg distance. After the seconds had lapsed into minutes and the minutes into more minutes, some bright young country gentleman ventured a suggestion. How over-flowing with suggestions is a crowd under such a trying circumstance, and how helpful and how kindly taken by the proud owner. The suggestion was to remove the brute. Yes, that was what they had been planning on doing for many, many minutes, but they were calculating where the point of attack would be the most easy. It had come to a show-down now, after the mustang had given signs of remaining indefinitely. The animal had to be removed. The summer season was coming on and the presence of such a remnant of by-gone days must be uprooted, even if it had to be dynamited. How cruel to dynamite one can get out of a balky horse provided he remains in neutral zones.

WOMEN'S ILLS

Charlevoix Women Are Finding Relief at Last.

It does seem that women have more than a fair share of the aches and pains that afflict humanity; they must "keep up," must attend to duties in spite of constantly aching backs, or headaches, dizzy spells, bearing-down pains; they must stoop over, when to stoop means torture. They must walk and bend and work with racking pains and many aches from kidney ills. Keeping the kidneys well has spared thousands of women much misery. Read of a remedy for kidneys that is endorsed by a people in this locality.

BALKY CAYUSE FURNISHES AMUSEMENT

namite a horse. But this was not a horse. This was a balky mustang which in every respect is radically different.

After suggesting that it would be effective to blow into his ear, twist his tail, tickle his heels, turn the hose on him, etc. ad infinitum with suggestions, it was decided to remove the cayuse by force. Stealthily four brave men approached their enemy. On tip-toe, scarcely breathing, they moved with the utmost expectancy to pick themselves up in yonder gutter. Did you see these brave fellows make the approach or have you seen others do the same stunt? Then you understand.

How careful they always handle this piece of flesh, even as if it were the body of a friend or an heirloom of the middle ages. Gradually they made the approach. Now they are within ten feet of the body, now six feet, now a yard, now an arm's length; and all the outstretched hands begin instinctively that stroking movement, signifying friendship, although they were doing it as a sham. But we digress,—they are within arm's length to repeat. The crowd sways in the tense excitement of the moment. Five hundred human beings (more or less) around the arena gaze with expectancy. Five hundred pairs of lungs wait for that intense moment when they can give forth a roar of praise and thanksgiving. One thousand eyes are focused on one measly mustang. Now those brave men are ready to grasp their prey.

What will the brute do? Is the question plowing its way through the brain of every person in the arena. Will he kick, chew, bark or what? There stood the animal. The perspiration stood out in great beads on the faces of the men and little biscuits were forming on the beautiful features of practically every woman in the audience. The thing was becoming serious now, especially when the rouge begins to run. Here were these men in danger of their lives and the crowd, representing the cream of the city, almost overcome. Something had to be done and quickly. In peering this out don't forget the setting as it now stands. The men must act quickly and simultaneously. Now within arm's length of him, they prepared for the last supreme effort. A woman screamed as the mustang drew a breath, for the excitement was telling on him too. Casting their eyes heavenward and with that look of grim determination of the real hero, in a body they fell with all their weight and strength on the cayuse. The sky was rent with the roar of the crowd, beautiful women fainted, strong men wept, and in the moment of the excitement the germs of a panic began to migrate in and out among the crowd. For seconds the crowd forgot the presence of the thing that caused all the excitement. After some more seconds, the crowd began to really come back to earth and out of their hypnotic state.

Where is that mustang? Did he kill those brave fellows? I should say not—the darn thing never moved. There it stood, pensive, and sadly swaying his head like a Chinese billican and uttering these words: "What the h—! is the matter? I am decidedly in wrong here," he remarked, and much disturbed and with the big tears coursing down his shaggy cheeks, he moved quickly and soberly down the street.

All this over a dumb brute. If that animal could have only talked, what would he have in truth said about us who made up the crowd? Some one said they saw the thing grin and we believe it.

The European situation dropped below par that night. A balky mustang had paid a visit to the city, and over the tea cups that evening throughout the city could be heard the ravings of an amused public.

FINE PROGRAM WAS RENDERED

"Peace" the Topic of W. C. T. U. Meeting Held Friday Afternoon.

Odillion Weed Was First Place in Oratorical Contest—Notes of the Meeting.

The meeting of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, held in the Baptist church Friday afternoon of last week, was one to be remembered for numerous pleasant features. The decorations were beautiful and profuse. The decorators did themselves proud, and the effort put forth by them was much appreciated. The music also, by members of the choir, was much enjoyed. The attendance was specially good, not only of members, but those not belonging to the organization, as well.

The meeting was called to order by the president, Mrs. Alcox. Singing by four young ladies of the Baptist church, "I Know My Father Knows." Devotions led by Rev. L. C. Vineyard.

After the reading of the minutes of the previous meeting by the secretary, reports of superintendents and other business, Mrs. Lewis read the announcement that the campaign is on for State Wide Prohibition. Further plans will be discussed later.

The program was next taken up. The topic of which was "Peace" was in charge of Mrs. H. P. Parmelee. It was an excellent one, consisting of readings by several of the members. The Women's International Peace Congress, has been recently held at the Hague, and was attended by women from not only the neutral countries, but from those countries engaged in the present war. The reading by Miss Miller, "Swords Beaten Into Plowshares," was of special interest, looking toward the fulfillment of prophecy in regard to the present war.

Mrs. Parmelee gave an interesting talk on the topic, which closed the program. After a recess, and waiting for the contestants to take their places, Mrs. Livingstone sang a solo.

The contestants all did finely. Six or seven entered and all but three dropped out, so instead of it being a "Medal Contest," a prize for the one who in the estimation of the judges showed more points in their favor was awarded. The judges were Rev. L. C. Vineyard, Mrs. H. Nichols, and Mrs. B. Saltonstall.

The names of the contestants are Lillian McNeil, Thelma Grady and Odillion Weed. All three did well, and had many points in their favor. The judges retired to compare notes, and found that Odillion Weed had the most points, and was awarded the prize of one dollar. The girls were not forgotten, and were each presented with some beautiful mementos. Rev. Taggart making the presentation speech.

During the retirement of the judges, "The White Ribbon Star Spangled Banner" was sung, and for encore "Mollie and the Baby."

At the close of the meeting two new members were secured.

Appeal of the Hymn.

What constitutes the appeal of the popular hymn? "Pilgrims of the Night" by Father Faber, has been as popular as any hymn of the past century, and one has to confess to a lump in the throat when it is sung. Nor is it merely on the sentimental level, for the hymn has effect. Froide records overhauling it in Hyde park one Sunday evening, when Curly, with deep emotion, had him come away, as he could never hear those words without desiring to weep. Yet I have still to meet the person who can give a clear interpretation of what is meant by Father's appealing lines.—London Chronicle.

MOTORCAR LUBRICATION.

Highly Important Matter That is Often Done Wrong or Neglected.

Although the following advice was intended for a special make of car, says the Automobile Dealer, it will apply with slight variation to most automobiles.

Once each day, or about every 100 miles, the crank case should be examined to insure that oil comes up to the level of the top try cock. Simply add new motor oil whenever the oil level falls below this point. The steering gear knuckle grease cups and steering cross rod grease cups should each receive one complete turn.

All spring bolt grease cups should be given a couple of complete turns each day. The springs take the entire jolting of the car. Squeaks develop in them very readily, so their lubrication is highly important. The speedometer driving gears should also receive attention daily. The wheel hubs, which must work hard whenever the car is in motion, should receive from at least ten to fifteen drops of motor oil per day.

About twice a week the fan hub should be given a few drops of motor oil. At the same time the pump shaft grease cups and steering gear grease cups should be given two complete turns. During this inspection see that the steering wheel and steering column each receive ten to fifteen drops of motor oil.

Every week give the spark and throttle shafts a few drops of oil. In the weekly inspection see that the transmission case has enough oil to cover the lower sliding gear shaft. At the same time thoroughly oil the brake pull rods, the clutch and brake pedals and give two complete turns to the brake cross rod grease cups. At this time see that the brake shafts for the rear wheels are thoroughly oiled. Inspect the torque rod, both front and rear, and on the weekly inspection the grease cups should receive two complete turns. An examination of the spring perches and one or two turns of the grease cups once a week will also do away with a lot of unpleasant noises.

About twice a month, or, say, every 500 miles, attention should be given to the magento bearings. They require only three or four drops of high grade light machine oil, but neglect of this lubrication may cause ignition trouble.

Once a month, or about every 1,000 miles of driving, the crank case should be thoroughly drained, the oil screens and filters should be cleaned thoroughly with gasoline and the oil well should be filled with motor oil to the top try cock. During the monthly inspection the spring leaves should be pried apart and thoroughly lubricated with graphite and grease. The hub caps should be removed and packed with new grease. The leather boots on the steering gear reach rods will also require a thorough packing with grease once a month. At the time of this monthly inspection give particular attention to the universal joints. The strain carried by the universals is very heavy, and to prevent undue wear the universal joint casing should be filled half full with cup grease, without fail, every 1,000 miles.

At the end of every 2,000 miles the differential housing should be opened and about three pints of axle compound added. At this time the transmission case should also be thoroughly drained, flushed with kerosene and refilled with new motor oil.

Creosoted Wood Inflammable.

Inflammability of creosoted wood and the danger that may attend its use are illustrated by the recent destruction by fire of the Kingston dock. Glasgow, says the Engineering Record. New wharfs were being constructed of heavily creosoted wooden piles, which were set on fire by a workman inserting a hot iron to clean out a newly bored hole. The flames spread with great rapidity and caused the destruction of the pier and the consequent collapse of the fronts of the adjacent quays and the fall of the steel dockheads and cranes. The elimination of creosoted wood in the rebuilding of the pier is considered because it is thought that new piling in hot weather may be ignited even by accidental proximity of service pipes or hot materials. The use of interlocking steel piles is proposed as an alternative.

A Hopeless Case.

Jake Gynn, who was notoriously bad, took advantage of a new storekeeper in the town and managed to get a dollar's worth of horse feed on credit. Finally, when the money was not forthcoming, the storekeeper set out to collect.

"I came to see you about that dollar for horse feed," said he, approaching Jake in a delectable distance from the house. "Do you think you can pay me today?"

"How's that?" returned Jake, putting a hand to his ear and speaking in a highly pitched voice. "What did ye say?"

"I said," returned the storekeeper, going close and shouting like a glee club, "that it's time you paid me that dollar."

"Can't hear a word ye say," declared Jake. "Ye'll have ter speak up a bit louder."

"Just wait a minute," cried the storekeeper, feeling in his pocket for a lead pencil. "I will write it down."

"Toldn't no one," returned Jake, with a hopeless shake of his head. "Can't see to read without my specs."—Philadelphia Telegraph.

Tailed Englishmen.

Natives of southern Arabia believed that Christians wore hats only to hide their horns. Formerly the continent of Europe clung to the conviction that the Englishman's nether garments concealed a tail. So late as the reign of Edward VI., according to tale, "an Englishman cannot travel in an other land by way of merchandise, but it is most contumeliously thrown into his teeth that all Englishmen have tails." The belief probably arose from the legend of the "Kentish Knave." The people of either Canterbury or Stroud (for the legend varies) mocked at Becket as he rode by on an ass and cut off the ass' tail. Wherefore they and their descendants were cursed with tails thereafter. At least so said jesters of other countries, and the shunder eventually reacted upon England in general.

ZUDORA

In the Twenty Million Dollar Mystery

By HAROLD MACGRATH

Copyright, 1914 and 1915, by Harold MacGrath

SYNOPSIS.

Zudora is left an orphan at an early age. Her father is killed in a gold mine, which grows to be worth $20,000,000, are left in the guardianship of Frank Keene, Zudora's mother's brother, who has set himself up as a Hindu mystic and is known as Hassam Ali. He decides that Zudora must die before she can have a chance to come into possession of her money, so that it may be left to him, the next of kin. Hassam Ali sees an obstacle to his scheme in the person of John Storm, a young lawyer, for whom Zudora has taken a fancy, and he commands the girl to put the man out of her mind. Zudora insists that if she cannot marry Storm she will marry no one.

"Well, well," says Hassam Ali, "solve my next twenty cases and you can marry him; fail in a single case and you must renounce him."

Zudora unravels a mystery and wins her first case—a case in which John Storm is saved from being convicted of a murder instigated by Hassam Ali himself.

Zudora and Hassam Ali visit Nabok Shan's house, where sleep overcomes every one whenever Nabok attempts to marry a princess. Storm, seeking Zudora, is made a prisoner. Zudora follows Nabok Shan, restores the princess to her original lover and saves Storm from death.

A maker of diamonds tells Hassam Ali that Storm is hiding in a cave near a hill near by. Storm is baffled in his investigation, but Zudora learns that her uncle has employed Jimmy Bolton, a half-witted man, thus to annoy Storm's parents. Zudora finds Bolton operating a big magic lantern and is attacked by him. Storm appears and saves her.

Hassam Ali asks Zudora to find a gem lost by two mysterious old men. Zudora gets a photograph of the gem and it burns in her hand. An old house is mined by Hassam Ali and the old men. Storm and Zudora are lured there and narrowly escape destruction when the house blows up.

John McWinter, endeavoring to trap and kill George Smith, is killed himself, and Smith is charged with murder. Hassam Ali conspires to have John Storm meet the same fate as McWinter, and he and Storm are overcome by powerful fumes.

Zudora saves them, proves that McWinter's own dog trapped and killed him and saves Smith from a band of lynchers.

An inventor blows up a submarine with a powerful heat ray which he sends through water. Hassam Ali sends Zudora to a photographer directly beneath the inventor's laboratory and orders the inventor to kill her. Zudora gets a warning, and her life is saved. The heat ray machine is destroyed, and the photographer, after a quarrel with Hassam Ali, is found dead in the river.

Wo Chang prevents Zudora's elopement with John Storm by hypnotizing her, and he and Hassam Ali attempt to smuggle her out of the country. This plot is frustrated by Storm.

Baird, Hassam Ali's double, falls in love with Zudora. Baird and Mme. Du Val kidnap Zudora and the Van Wick child. Storm rescues them, and Hassam Ali dies.

With Hassam Ali dead Zudora is released of her pledge to solve twenty cases. She confronts, however, the greatest mystery of all, which is the mystery of her own life, and the ambition to secure the vast fortune of $20,000,000 left to her. This great photo serial is being shown in the leading moving picture theaters by the Thanhouser Film Corporation. Among those participating are Marguerita Snow, Mary Elizabeth Forbes, James Cruise, in the new role of reporter-hero, Sidney Bracey and Frank Farrington.

On looking through her uncle's papers Zudora finds that her father left her an interest in a diamond mine, and Storm and Baird both lend assistance in trying to reclaim for her possession of this estate, which is being appropriated by rogues under the leadership of Mme. Du Val. They plan to frighten Zudora so that she will run away. Failing, they kidnap Zudora and Howard, the mine superintendent, and put them in a private insane asylum. Howard dies, but Zudora, nearly finished, is rescued by Storm and his friends. Detective Hunt and Baird find the Zudora gold mine.

Mrs. Copeland's jewels are stolen, but recovered through the cleverness of Hunt and Baird.

CHAPTER XVI.

ONE bright, keen winter day Zudora and Mrs. Ramsay sat in the former's room discussing the malignancy of the star that hovered over Zudora's destiny. If only she might find one bit of complete evidence against her enemies or some document to fully uphold her claim! She could do nothing at court with these fragments, these half sheets. Possession was nine points in law, and it did not require John Storm's legal advice to convince her of this fact.

If Hassam Ali had not been a thorough villain all valuable papers would have been deposited in the deposit box at the bank. More, and more she became convinced that her uncle had had sinister designs upon her life; that he had been maneuvering to get her out of the way so that he might control the entire fortune. All she wanted was to be left free. Well, sooner or later something would turn up, some workable plan. Three such men as Storm, Baird and Hunt would find a clink in the enemy's armor.

"I'm going to look through that old trunk again," Zudora declared, rising. "Come and help me."

So the two of them dragged out the trunk and went through every thing religiously so thoroughly that a moth could not have escaped. Protruding from a torn place in the lining Zudora came upon a sheet of paper. She studied the poem from all angles, but could make nothing of it. However, she told it aside to Storm's appraisal.

What puzzled her as much as any thing was too that the spurious enthusiasts had the law on their side.

where they secured their money? How had they learned that there existed documents, that there were gold and diamond mines? Hassam Ali certainly had not confided these facts to them.

"There is nothing but this sheet with the poem," she declared finally. "I can't make anything out of it."

"You poor child! Why don't you marry your sweetheart and have done with all this? He has plenty for both."

"That isn't it, Mrs. Ramsay. I come from a fighting stock, and I will never

"Why don't you marry your sweetheart?"

give up this fight until I am beaten." She glanced at the clock. "It is time John was here. Why not come along with us? The skating will be due."

"I haven't had skates on in an age," protested Mrs. Ramsay.

"That won't matter; all the more fun for you," insisted Zudora.

"You're a strange girl."

"In what way?"

"Why, you can throw off your burdens so quickly, without apparent effort."

"I do not throw them off; I merely refuse to let them dampen what pleasure I can get out of life," Zudora ran to a window. "There he is now! He's just as patient and kindly as he can be. And there's a box under his arm. I'll wager it's a box of violets. He never forgets the fact that I love flowers."

She did not notice the two men loitering on the opposite side of the street, Radcliffe and Gyp the gun man.

Storm came in, his eyes clear and his cheeks full of color. He was bubbling with cheer.

"All aboard! The ice will be just splendid. Here's a bunch of violets for you, sweetheart."

"Thank you, John," Zudora placed the flowers against her waist. "You are very thoughtful, after all the trouble I have caused you."

"Piffle! What man wouldn't be thoughtful if he had you always in mind? What's this? Been rummaging around in the old trunk again? Find anything?"

"Here's a bunch of violets for you, sweetheart."

"Nothing but this sheet of paper," John took it. "Why, it looks like a scrap or plan of a mine!"

"A mine?" chorused Zudora and Mrs. Ramsay.

"And I didn't know what it could be!" exclaimed Zudora.

"I'll wager it's some data regarding the boundaries of the diamond mine in Africa. Anyhow, I'd hang on to it. It may be worthless, and again it may have value. Put it back in the trunk. My rule is, never throw away any scrap of paper you do not thoroughly understand."

Whatever I sign a son-that I go to a brother lawyer to see if he gets the same points I do. Put a back into the trunk and I am along. I'll be out of doors today."

when Radcliffe and Gyp the gun man saw the three depart for the skating pond the former instructed the gun man to remain on the watch and to whistle in case of danger. He himself was determined to enter the house and have a thorough look into Zudora's room. He found an unlocked window in the rear, and through this he entered the house. Everybody was out, including the servant. He could not have found a better opportunity.

He knew where Zudora's room was, having once made a midnight visit to it. They had tricked him out of a fine lot of gems, and he had not yet recovered from the chagrin of this fact. To this day he had not the least idea where they had hidden the stones. He was certain that the gems were not in the house at present. Doubtless they had been disposed of secretly.

The first thing that welcomed his gaze was the battered old trunk. The scorched leather at once convinced him that this had come from the house of Hassam Ali. He knelt beside it and threw back the lid. He eyed curiously the spangles and tulle of the old circus days. But the folded sheet of paper interested him far more. And when he spread it out and discovered that it was practically a complete survey of the mine in Africa he was delighted. He already knew the details of the African property. So far as he was concerned it was of no intrinsic value, but it would eventually be valuable to Zudora. So he stuffed it into his pocket and went on with his search. Then he came upon the false bottom to the trunk, and here he found the documents which completed the case. He laughed. With these in his possession Zudora would lose her case in any court in America. What a find! Neither the girl nor her advisers had ever thought to thoroughly investigate the battered old leather trunk!

He was in high feather when he stole out of the Ramsay house. He had made a great find. He was legally master of millions. It would be a simple case of manufacturing a will of prior date to Zudora's, upon old legal nap, with the notary's seal of some old chap who had died in Montana. It would be very easy now that he had all the documents in the case. Mme. Du Val would be pleased, so pleased that she might lead a more willing ear to his plans. They had had this trunk all these weeks and had not thought to sound it for a false bottom. That was supreme luck. He felt more and more assured of his star as he rejoined Gyp. Millions, luxury, all his cravings to be gratified!

And Zudora, flying across the smooth, glistening surface of the pond, began to have hopes that her star had reached its nadir and was once more ascending toward the zenith. Well, perhaps it was. The sunshine, the exhilaration of the sport, the nearness of one beloved, these would have set cheer into many a heart darker than Zudora's.

When the three of them returned to Mrs. Ramsay's the latter served tea, and for an hour it was a happy family. Then Storm remembered the survey map.

"You'd better let me have that and lock it up in my safe," he suggested.

"You never can tell what will happen these days."

But Zudora searched the leather trunk from top to bottom in vain.

"That's funny! You saw me put it on the top tray?"

"I did," said Storm gravely. He went about the room examining the windows. He left the two women and went downstairs. On the linenman in the kitchen he saw muddy tracks. That was enough. "Some one has been here during our absence," he declared on returning to Zudora's room. "Whoever it was has got that paper. Evidently I was watched, and when we went to the pond the watcher came into the kitchen window. Well, perhaps I'm to blame. I should have put it into my pocket."

Meantime in Detective Hunt's office things were being arranged for the ascendency of Zudora's star, which was in truth very low.

"Baird, I'm going to enter the Du Val villa by the front door this trip."

"What do you mean by that?" asked the late Hassam Ali's double.

"I mean that I'm going to enter in a capacity which will excite Madame's vanity. There's no woman alive that does not like the idea of having her likeness perpetuated in oil if done by a celebrated artist."

"That's true enough," said Baird. "Go on. I'm interested."

"Well, I'm going to take that celebrated artist."

"But, Lord, a girl can you that?"

Has Used a Majestic Range For Over Twelve Years

It hardly seems possible that any Range could be used this length of time, but the following sworn affidavit of R. T. Mears states that he has used a Majestic Range in his home for this length of time, and that today, as far as he can see, the range is good for many years more of service. Read what he says about the Majestic:

State of Michigan,
County of Charlevoix, ss.

R. T. Mears, being duly sworn, deposes and says that he has used a Majestic Range in his home for the past twelve years. Deponent further swears that during this time he has spent but 75c for repairs on said Majestic Range, and that today the range is in splendid condition and shows but little evidence of its long usage. Deponent further says that during a greater portion of this time he has burned coal in the above mentioned range, and that he has never had to replace any of the parts of the fire box, and that the fire back is, from all that he can see, as good as ever.

My commission expires July 13, 1915.

What better recommendation can a Range be given than that above by Mr. Mears for the Majestic.

Users of the Majestic from all parts of the country give testimony of the same nature. If you want a range that is a fuel saver, easy to operate, one that will LAST, the Majestic is the one to buy.

The Farmer is the Producer

A town-full of merchants might buy and sell among themselves for a year, and at the end be not a dollar richer in money or property. But let a community of farmers work their farms for a year and that community will be a great deal richer. The farmer does not merely handle money, he produces it—attracts it to the community from afar.

The Charlevoix County Bank realizes that the prosperity of Charlevoix depends greatly upon the farmer. It wants to see Charlevoix thrive. Then this bank will thrive. What can we do for you?

"Yes. Just at present he's in the trenches in Alsace." "So I learned. But Mme. Du Val will not dig deep so long as I can keep her vanity stirred. Now, then, watch your Uncle Dudley. In ten minutes I'll be the exact counterpart of the painter as he was during his last visit, six months ago. He came with splendid introductions, one of which I have. And I've based a neat little forgery on it. Here's La Fontaine's photograph. Keep your eye on me and take a lesson on how to get into the skin of another man. I want to get into that villa the worst kind of way. It keeps going through my head that there is some connection between it and that old junk but or garage we've skyraked in once or twice."

"I recollect the place," observed Baird dryly. "They nearly had me there one day."

Hunt went to work rapidly and skillfully and within the stipulated time presented an appearance that was near enough to that of the real artist to fool the ordinary eye.

"Spot work," cried Baird. "I tell you what, you enter the villa and get established, and I on my part will see MEN whose political memory runs back 20 years, are finding a close and curious parallel between the political conditions of 1895 and those of 1915. The country then had a Democratic administration, Cleveland's. The country today has a Democratic administration, Wilson's. The country then had a Democratic tariff law, the Wilson-Gorman bill. The country today has a Democratic tariff law, the Underwood-Simmons bill. Then, as now, there was widespread unemployment and deep discontent all over the land. Then, as now, the country had just experienced sweeping Republican victories in the elections of the previous "off year." Then, as now, the municipal elections of the springtime showed the continued sweep of Republican ascendancy. Then, as now, the country was looking forward with eagerness to its approaching relief from Democratic administration and restoration of the Republican party to power. The political indications of 1895 found their fulfillment in the election of McKinley in 1896. The political indications of 1915 will find their fulfillment in the election of another Republican president in 1916.

THERE was something akin to prevision in the statement of Woodrow Wilson's in a public letter of Oct. 19, 1912, when he said that under the new freedom "American industry would have a new buoyancy of hope, a new energy, a new variety." How true the words have proven to be! Where American industry formerly had the buoyancy of prosperity, it now has the "buoyancy of hope." Having enjoyed a period of rest from normal activity, it has a new energy awaiting the return of Republican opportunity. And certainly there has been something new in the variety of experience through which American industry has passed. Fortunate it is that American industry never loses hope and the American people never lose the right to vote.

JACOB H. SCHIFF says the country is going to enter upon an era of unprecedented prosperity. Yes, and simultaneously it will enter upon a renewed period of Republican control.

At the present rate of decline of the balance in the treasury, it won't be long till a silver dollar will look as big as a cart wheel to Brother McAdoo. And there are some millions of jobless men to whom a dime will look like a dinner pail.

THE boys are not worrying much about low marks on the school reports, provided they can keep their error column blank in the ball score.

BE careful about taking off your "heavies," but nobody ever caught cold getting rid of an ingrowing grouch.

THAT bad smell is not the Germans exploding a bomb of noxious gases, but merely your neighbor's automobile.

THE Lusitania incident is the best argument yet produced why we should "see America first."

At the wedding reception the young man remarked: "Wasn't it annoying the way that baby cried during the whole ceremony?" "It was simply dreadful," replied the prim little maid of honor; "and when I get married I'm going to have engraved right in the corner of the invitations: 'No babies expected.'"

Sammy was not prone to over exertion in the class room; therefore his mother was both surprised and delighted when he came home one noon with the announcement, "I got 100 this morning." "That's lovely," exclaimed his proud mother and she kissed him tenderly. What was it in? "Fifty in reading and fifty in arithmetic."

Jones had an inviolable way of asking the wrong question or making the wrong comment. So it was, when at a dinner party his neighbor, a lady, said to him: "I am a thoro believer, you know, Mr. Smith, that men's clothes should match their hair; a black-haired man should wear black clothes, a brown-haired man should wear brown clothes. Don't you think so?" "That may be," bungled Jones, "but suppose a man is bald?"

Mrs. Black's servant girl had been in the habit of going out to meet the grocer's boy when he came to the back door with goods. Observing this, Mrs. Black watched one day and saw the boy kiss Norah heartily. When the girl came in Mrs. Black said severely: "Norah, I saw the grocer's boy kiss you this morning when you went out for the groceries. Hereafter I shall go myself." "All right, mum," said Norah, "but 'twill do yez no good. He sez he won't kiss nobody but me."

CLASS OF '15 BANQUETED

Members of Class at St. Mary's School Entertained By Room III.

One of the most enjoyable events of the season took place Thursday evening, May 13, when the Class of 1915, the first to complete the course of study prescribed for the commercial department of St. Mary's High School, were given a banquet by the members of Room III.

The banquet hall was artistically decorated with red and white, the class colors, while red and white carnations, the class flower, adorned the tastefully arranged tables. Dainty hand-painted place cards, the work of the children, indicated the location of each fortunate guest, while the unique favors added to the appearance of the tables. About sixty were seated at the sumptuous banquet, while the seventh and eighth grade girls served. During the banquet music was furnished by Ellen Graham, Eileen Fairchild, Eleanor Finnan, Marguerite Allard, Kathryn Gaskin, Minnie Raber, Eileen Allard, Monica Smith, Marguerite Graham, John Smith, Clair Cartier and Stanley McCafferty.

At the close of the banquet, Harold Cartier was chosen toastmaster, and the children responded to the toasts in a manner which would have done credit to their elders. The heartiness of the applause showed the appreciation of the pupils' efforts and at the conclusion all voted them capital entertainers.

Then there is another side of the question that makes this suggestion important. The city spreads out over an area of considerable extent. Suppose a cottage on the Belvedere grounds or the hotel is on fire. What chance is there under the present arrangement to save the building? Would there be a greater chance with a fire team and hose wagon? Other examples could be given in case fires started at the upper end of Dixon avenue or Michigan avenue.

It is also important to remember that every property holder in a town or city has the right to demand that the city afford him the right sort of fire protection. Under the existing conditions is not the city placing itself liable to the settlement of damages in case a property holder, fire having destroyed his home, wanted to push the matter?

This is not a matter that should be altogether pushed by the department and neither, and as has been mentioned before, a cause to complain against the firemen. Every tax payer has a right to have his or her idea on the subject, but judging from past experience, there is only one conclusion that can be drawn—Charlevoix should have a new modern equipped fire department.

SWING BRIDGE BY POWER

Pere Marquette Railroad Installs New Machinery for Opening and Shutting Draw.

The Pere Marquette Railroad company recently installed a ten-horse power electric dynamo for swinging the bridge over the cut leading from Pine Lake into Round Lake. The bridge now can be opened and closed without the mechanic leaving the operating room. Heretofore the bridge was opened by hand power, which was slow and tedious. Under the new arrangement only a minute is taken up in opening the cut or closing the same.

The mechanism of the new system is very complete. The dynamo is located just under the bridgeman's house and is operated by a controller within the house. Also the bridge is locked and unlocked by a system of levers so that it is not necessary for the operator to leave his room during the process of opening or closing the bridge. A day man and a night man will be at the bridge during the summer months as in previous years.

REFORMING A SAVAGE.

After the Treatment He Became Quite a Gentlemanly Chap.

In "Among the Primitive Bakongo" John H. Weeks tells the story of a chief, Mampuya of Kinkuzi, who called on him at Watben station to request that a teacher be sent to his own. "He seemed a very quiet, gentlemanly sort of man," says Mr. Weeks, "and I was very much surprised to hear that he had not always been so deferential and modest."

Mampuya at one time treated the people of his town in a very contemptuous fashion and was always extorting, on one plea or another, fowls, goats and other goods from them. "At last they could bear his extortions no longer, and so they bound him securely, put him on a shelf in his own house, built a fire under him and sprinkled a quantity of red pepper on it. Then they went out and shut the door closely behind them. The pungent smoke filled the hut, and Mampuya sneezed tremendously. He would have died if there had been a little more pepper on the fire."

"At last they took him out of the cage and tied a stick across his chest to his extended arms with the intention of punishing him still further but they let him off on payment of a fine and many promises of better behavior, which promises he has scrupulously kept."

GEOGRAPHICAL NAMES.

Why Foreign Nomenclature Often Puzzles American Readers.

Foreign geographical names often prove confusing to American readers because each European country has a name of its own for each of its cities, rivers and other geographical features. Every other nation has a different name for the same thing. American geographers follow the English in their nomenclature, but often employ a different pronunciation.

For example, we call one Belgian city Antwerp, while the Belgians and French call it Anvers. We term another Belgian city Mechlin, while at home it is termed Maastricht. The river Meuse is pronounced in Belgium and France very nearly as we would pronounce it, while the Germans pronounce it as if it were spelled Moysay, and the people of the Netherlands call it the Maas. Brussels is spelled Bruxelles at home, and the final s is not pronounced. Dendermonde, on the river Dender, is pronounced Dindermond by its inhabitants, but it is known as Termonde in most of the geographical names. Antwerp is also spelled Alost. Louvain is Louvain at home, Vienna is Wien and Ghent is Gand.

So one might go down the line. It is to be hoped that some day the geographical societies will get together and agree upon a nomenclature that will be universally adopted.—Detroit Tribune

The Pyrophore.

A living light, called the pyrophore, makes illumination cheap and convenient in Brazil. The pyrophore is a monster beetle an inch and a half long. With one it is possible to read fine print, and three will light a room. The Brazilian peasant, when he traverses by night the perilous forest paths of his country, fastens to each shoe a pyrophore. Thus illuminated, he has no difficulty in avoiding poisonous snakes, pitfalls and wild beasts. The Brazilian coquette fastens in her hair or her corsage a pyrophore incased in white tulle. The effect is as of a great luminous pearl or opal. When a pyrophore's light goes out it is not necessary to fill his eye with oil, to drop a coin in his ear or to throw him away, but a moment's ducking in cold water suffices. Thereafter his three little lanterns, one on the breast and two on the back, emit again as bright a radiance as ever.

British Life Guards.

England's famous life guards, now regarded as the oldest cavalry command in the world, were organized just after the restoration. They were recruited from the old cavaliers who fought for Prince Charles Stuart, and in 1661 they were formed into three troops, then known as the King's Own, the Duke of York's and the Duke of Albemarle's. At that time it was always demanded that one troop should be raised in Scotland in honor of the house of Stuart. It was the duty of the life guards to protect the sovereign and the royal family.—Argonaut

The Sea Horse.

The sea horse has a little pouch in its ventral surface, into which in some manner it places the eggs of its mate. When they are hatched and become too numerous and large to control the sea horse presses the pouch against a stone and gently urges them to take their departure. At this time they are very small, but they grow rapidly and are preyed upon by myriads of fishes.

BAPTIST CHURCH NOTES BY THE PASTOR

Sunday next, will be a great day with us. The G. A. R. and W. R. C. will attend our service and an invitation has been sent all other churches and ministers to come.

Sunday next, together with several of the choir, we go to Burgess, where after a list of special music, we speak on "The Gift of Gifts." Fine people at Burgess but that community needs more Gospel preaching.

We made our first visit to Marion last Sunday. Had a fair audience and met some fine people—some were Christians and some told me they were not. What a pity that good men and women will put off Salvation. Several of our young people went out with us Sunday and assisted in the singing. We surely are proud of our young folks and justly so, too.

Some folks don't like the way we preach—they say we talk too plain. Now friend, you should at least be as sensible as a cow or donkey. Feed them hay containing briars and they pick out the hay and leave the briars alone. Natural though for the fellow who gets hit to "Holler."

Many are just fine folks, so long as you will carry them around on a chip and rub their heads, but if you fail to faithfully perform these "duties" they become offended and join the Devil's company of Higher Respected Citizens, called "quitters." Shame on such folks.

On Tuesday afternoon at two o'clock May 25th, a committee of 100 will leave the Baptist church and take a church census of Charlevoix. You will do us a kindly favor by helping to furnish the information desired, and by this work we hope to be enabled to learn the general conditions of our town, in so much that our people may be able to help all who need help at any time and in any way. We do this with a prayer that God may help us to do the real ministry of our Lord.

Sincerely,
Lloyd C. Vineyard, Pastor.

delighted to give him as many sittings as he desired.

Baird met Hunt a short distance from the villa, and the two of them walked toward town.

"What luck?" asked the reporter.

"It was the easiest bit of work I ever did. When you take a woman's vanity you follow her. I'm going to put up at one of the hotels. She might have it in her mind to call me up to change the hour of appointment. Tomorrow I'll begin to outline her features. You where that elusive triploid leads to.

At 4 that afternoon Hunt, armed with his forged introduction, presented himself at the front door of the Du Val villa. He was ushered in by the pompous footman. The pencil artist was requested to be seated. Then the footman took the letter upstairs to his mistress, who was more delighted by the letter than the thought of being visited. She had met the distinguished French nobleman twice, and it flattered her greatly to believe that she had been remembered. And more than this, the famous artist had once noted her singular beauty and never would be happy until he had put it upon canvas.

Thus Hunt's initial reception was most cordial. Mme. Du Val would be able to take it from me, though, that she'll never hang this portrait anywhere for her friends to see. What I want is a few minutes alone beside that villa, when they think I'm outside of it. That's the ticket, and it may take a week or two to make the play.

Later, when they reached another part of the town, Baird caught Hunt by the arm.

"See that old codger ahead of us?"

Hunt nodded.

"Well, that's the diamond cutter I told you about. Suppose we run along after him and see where he goes?"

The old man led them to his den without so much as a single glance over his shoulder. Hunt agreed to go while Baird stood on guard outside. Half an hour later Hunt rejoined the reporter.

"I have seen Captain Hatcliffe go in there," said Baird. "And I've just been thinking hard."

"Not" cried the detective jestingly.

"That barbed man in Montana and the captain shape up a good deal alike."

"So much alike that I'm certain they are one and the same. I've been thinking too. But when a fisherman casts his net he first makes sure that there are no holes in it. That old fisherman's face is known to me. Half the scoundrel gems go to him, but we can't arrest the old boy. It's only logical that if some one brings him a stone to cut he cuts it without asking questions. But I'm hanged if I don't stop some of the men who go there. I can't bother with him now. I want Mme. Du Val's portrait started."

Four days later at half after 4—at the same moment Zadora and Storm set out upon a short automobile trip—you could have seen the detective in his velvet jacket, darning away earnestly and while no inconsiderable success. He could patch and patch well, but he was a man who required attention to detail.

bility, and it irked him to sit in a chair for an hour or two with the odor of paint making him headachy.

Mme. Du Val sat so that from the corner of her eye she could watch the fountain. By and by Hunt laid aside his palette.

"That will be all for today. I am quite sure you are tired."

"Join me with a cup of chocolate," she said smilingly.

While they were sipping the chocolate, the fountain jet reversed. Hunt pretended not to notice this peculiarity, but he could see that Madame began to stir restlessly. Suddenly she set down her cup, complaining of a violent headache. Hunt gathered up his materials and politely excused himself. The footman, however, in letting him out failed to note that the female of Hunt's came had caught between the door and the jamb. Cautiously the detective re-entered and slipped into the conservatory. He waited for a moment or two, then stole out into the salon. A spot on one of the cushions attracted his attention. Upon close inspection he found it to be a sliding panel. He was fumbling about for a method to open it when he heard footsteps. He slipped behind the portiere.

It was Mme. Du Val, coming down to greet Captain Hatcliffe, who had just come in. She at once showed him the portrait. He shrugged. He was not at all interested in this style of art.

"There goes the fountain," he warned.

"Merciful heaven, I had forgotten all about those fools! They struck the signal while La Fontaine was here, but luckily he did not notice it. Let them in."

Hunt was very much surprised to see three old antagonists enter the room from one of the columns. He was still more surprised when he saw Madame open the secret drawer in the onyx table. His eyes snapped. That table would be worth while. Just as soon as these precious rogues left the salon he determined to investigate. He was an ingenious man, but his ingenuity failed utterly to learn the secret of the onyx table. He was certain, however, that it held all he wanted so badly. He left the villa unobserved.

In the meantime Baird had discovered that the tunnel from the garage led directly to the Du Val villa, but he had chosen a bad day for the investigation. The three crooks, returning from their visit, caught sight of him and gave chase. He reached the trap door in the garage first, but before he could make the door they were upon him. He succeeded in lifting out two of them, but the largest man proved to be a tough customer. This was not the first time Baird had felt the bear-like grip of the man.

They battled through the doorway, along the sidewalk, until they reached the bridge. That Baird lived to tell the tale was due solely to the unexpected arrival of Zadora and Storm. They recognized Baird as he and his antagonist toppled over the parapet into the icy stream below, where the fight still raged. At length the reporter succeeded in getting free of the clutch of his antagonist, who paid the penalty for his loyalty to a bad cause. Storm got a rope from his tool box. This he tied to the extra tire, flung it out toward Baird as one would throw a life preserver at sea. Baird was all in. He had just strength enough to grasp the tire, and Storm hauled away with a will.

Diamonds From Sugar.
Although at first thought the statement seems incredible, it is perfectly true that a lump of sugar may be converted into diamonds. Not all the substance of the sugar, of course, will enter into the composition of the diamond, but only the carbon that it contains. Sugar consists of carbon united with oxygen and hydrogen. It is an easy matter to separate out the carbon, and in certain experiments for the production of diamonds this sugar carbon has been employed. The diamonds so produced were, of course, very small and destitute of commercial value, but still they were real diamonds and the chemical result achieved would be no greater intrinsically if they were as big as the Cullinan. Scientists have often expressed the hope that an improvement in the process of manufacturing diamonds may be effected whereby the necessity of dissolving the carbon in molten iron may be dispensed with, and the required combination of great pressure with great heat may be brought about by some such operation as squeezing the carbon between red hot metal plates.—Exchange.

Origin of Mussel Catching.
Mussel culture in France—where it is carried on more extensively than anywhere else—originated so far back as 1235, when an Irish ship was wrecked near La Rochelle. One of the rescued sailors, James Walton, being hard put to it for a living, conceived the plan of setting nets on poles for the capture of sea fowl at night, the muddy shores of the bay being frequented by these birds in large numbers. Before long he noticed that myriads of young mussels became attached to the stakes, and that, being above the level of the mud, these grew rapidly. Thereupon he interlarded branches of trees between the stakes, thus forming a kind of wicker work, which also became coated with mussels. Walton's example was followed by some of the natives of La Rochelle and an industry was started which has now flourished for close on 800 years.—London Mail.

Buckingham Palace.
Buckingham palace stands on the site of pleasure grounds known to the days of Evelyn and Pepys and frequently mentioned in their diaries as the Mulberry gardens. The property was eventually bought by the Duke of Buckingham, who erected the first house, which, however, was not large or handsome, notwithstanding that it was even then called Buckingham palace. George III. purchased it from the dowager Duchess of Buckingham as a residence for Queen Charlotte, whose palace, Somerset House, in the Strand, was required for public purposes. After much haggling with his majesty's agent the duchess parted with it for £60,000. It was not greatly altered till 1821, when it was enlarged and almost rebuilt after designs by Joseph Nash for the London residence of the royal family.—London Chronicle.

Asking Too Much.
"This is an age of invention," remarked the luminous philosopher. "Then," said his friend, "maybe you can concoct a new excuse for me to give my wife for not going home to dinner tonight?"

Whereat the punctured philosopher subsided.—Cleveland Plain Dealer.

LAURA AND PETRARCH.

The Poet's Ideal and a Sad Case of Hopeless Love.

Petrarch was one of the unfortunate poet lovers. One day in the Church of St. Clare, in Avignon, he met Micia, do Sade, better known as "Laura," a delightful blond, whose soft, dark eyes contrasted strangely, yet coquishly, with the pale golden hair that rippled in ringlets over her white forehead. This duty dame was of noble birth, enjoyed a high social standing and was considered the belle of the entire sunny south of those days.

The Italian poet fell helplessly and hopelessly in love with the French beauty. He wrote in her honor hundreds of sonnets full of the choicest tenderness, in which he described his sweetheart's mental and physical charms, and vowed that never lived a fairer woman than she. Yet she was oblivious to his suit, though she confessed herself pleased with his society. She was by nature fond of admiration, and she felt proud of the fact that she had won the devotion of one of the greatest poets of the age. Wherever she promenade, whether in the parks or streets, she heard the gossiping murmur as she passed. "There goes the beloved of Petrarch."

Laura was platonically fond of her poet, but no amount of poetry could induce her to bestow a warmer affection upon him. She died of the plague in 1331. Her death was a rude shock to Petrarch, who still loved her and mourned her loss for the remaining twenty-six years of his life.—Cleveland Commercial Tribune.

When Napoleon was a youth of ten while at the military school at Brienne he wrote to his mother in Corsica. "With Homer in my pocket and my sword by my side I hope to carve my way through the world."

SAUL'S LAST BATTLE.

1 Samuel 23.—May 12.

Distressed, He Aided Aid of the Witch of Endor—Obscured by Evil Spirits. The Battle Lost—Saul and Jonathan Slain—The Song of the Bow, or Saul's Dead March—David King of Judah. Later, King of All Israel.

"Jehovah is my strength and my shield; my heart trusted in Him, and I am helped."—Psalm 28:7.

PERSECUTED and hunted by King Saul, no place was safe for David. The Philistines, desiring him for a friend rather than a foe, gave him and his followers the city of Ziklag. While residing there, David's conquests were over the Amalekites.

Meantime, the end of Saul's reign was nearing. A fresh Philistine invasion required all the army he could muster, and he felt very dubious respecting the results. Although, in harmony with the Divine regulation, he had ordered all who claimed to communicate with the dead to leave Israel, nevertheless some remained. In his extremity, King Saul visited the Witch of Endor.

The witch got into communication with the fallen angels, who she supposed, as spiritualists still suppose, were the spirits of the dead. But the Bible assures us that "the dead know nothing." Samuel was sleeping with his fathers, awaiting the resurrection Morning. Then as now, evil spirits through mediums personated David inquiring of the Lord.

The Bible clearly teaches that the dead are dead and can give no information whatever; that they are simply in a state of suspended animation, awaiting the better Day when Messiah will bring the knowledge of God's glory to all, as the result of His ransom sacrifice at Calvary. The teaching that the dead are alive contradicts God's Word, and is the foundation of the grievous errors which have distressed Christians. None would pray for the dead or say masses for their release from Purgatory. If they knew that their dead were merely sleeping until the resurrection.

"The Song of the Bow."
When David heard of the defeat, his sympathy for Saul and Jonathan was expressed in a beautiful poem (2 Samuel 1:17-27). The Dead March from Saul is an attempt to put into modern music David's Song of the Bow.

In the battle Saul's sons were killed, including Jonathan. Saul himself was wounded. Fearing lest the Philistines would torture him to death, he finally decided to let a young Amalekite bring him the news, telling that he had dispatched King Saul at the latter's request—probably, however, manufacturing this part to bring honor to himself. But David commanded him to be put to death.

Realizing that the time had come to move from the Philistine country, David inquired of the Lord by the priest and the ephod. The answer was that he should go to Hebron, in Judea. Thither David and his companions removed with their families; and the tribe of Judah, his own tribe, promptly recognized him as their king. King Saul's son Ishbosheth had survived; and Abner, Saul's chief general, had him anointed king of Israel.

Finally Abner, angered with King Ishbosheth, proposed to become David's vassal. King David upbraided the proposition, doubtless considering it the Lord's will. However, the matter did not carry out; for Joab, David's nephew, slew Abner deceitfully. Instead of rejoicing in Abner's death, the king mourned for him and denounced his nephew's wrong course.

King of All Israel.

Shortly after this, others, misunderstanding King David, slew King Ishbosheth and brought his head to David, expecting to be rewarded. They also were condemned, and slain. All these things endured the king to the people, who perceived that he was broad-minded and generous. He seems to have had a great appreciation of justice, and also a hundredth of sympathy for his enemies.

Finally the other eleven tribes invited David to become king over all Israel. This was probably seventeen years after his anointing by Samuel. Faith and patience mark every step of those years, and reveal King David's character as we could not otherwise have known it. Its grandeur was chiefly manifested in his devotion to God and his submission to God's will.

Meantime King David had grown strong in conquering his enemies—the Lord's enemies. God had declared that the iniquity of the Amorites had come to the full, and that they should be destroyed. Whether destroyed in battle, by pestilence, famine or war, the Divine sentence must be carried out.

Those who died by Israel's sword will awake in the Millennial Kingdom. They will then be freed from ignorance and superstition, with Messiah's Kingdom ready to help them back to his happy inheritance. Let us be redeemed at Calvary.

Temperance

(Conducted by the National Women's Christian Temperance Union.)

NATION ON THE WATER WAGON.

"The German emperor has put us in the way of saving ourselves. Not be, but drink, was our enemy, and the Kaiser has slain our enemy for us. He has made us adopt temperance and nothing can defeat us now." This was said in Petrograd by Mr. Benelowsky, director of the Russian-American Steamship company and a member of the duma, as reported by Mary Isabel Brush in an article, "A Nation on the Water Wagon," in the Saturday Evening Post. To the czar the writer gives credit for the empire-wide stoppage of drink. Others, she says, would have stopped the sale of vodka merely for the mobilization, but it had long been the determination of the czar to abolish the evil and with this war came the psychological moment. When his prime minister declared a total abstinence measure "impossible" he requested his resignation, and shortly afterward issued the mandate which lifted the liquor curse from a domain which covers one-seventh of the entire globe.

"Russia," says Mrs. Brush, "entirely sober for the first time in her national existence, stands up bright and buoyant, with a new hope and a new joy. She has no regrets and no problems. Even the malster of finance, His Excellency Mr. Bark, says she has not, as he stands smiling with optimism in the capital of his emancipated country and faces the situation of raising—to replace the revenue from vodka—the modest sum of a thousand million rubles a year."

BEER CONCOEMNEO.

After twenty-five years of practice Dr. S. S. Lungen, a leading physician and surgeon, has this to say about beer: "It is difficult to find any part in the confirmed beer drinker's machinery that is doing its work as it should. This is why their life is a constant struggle. They are like a man who has a glass rod when disease or accident gives them a little blow. Beer drinking shortens life. This is not a mere opinion; it is a well-settled, recognized fact. Physicians and insurance companies accept this as unquestionably as any other undisputed fact of science. The great English physicians decide that the heart's action is increased 13 per cent in its efforts to throw off alcohol introduced into the circulation. The result is easily figured out. The natural pulse beat is 76 per minute. If we multiply this by 60 an hour, and 24 hours in a day, and add 13 per cent, we find that the heart has been compelled to do an extra work during that time in throwing off the burden of a few drinks equal to 15.5 tons lifted one foot high."

REASONS FOR ABSTINENCE.

It's hard to be a physical advisor and keep off the subject of alcoholic liquors when you realize that there never can be anything like a high average of physical well-being in a country where a large part of the male population insists on poisoning itself regularly or periodically. I will simply sum up a few of the reasons—strictly from the standpoint of the physical trainer—why men should not drink alcohol.

Alcohol is not a food; it is a drug. It injures the blood.

It retards the digestion. It is the worst enemy of the brain worker.

It hardens the liver. It destroys the kidneys.

It furnishes no support to the body. It is a depressant.

It is a most destructive agent in the state of health or of disease.

It deadens the body and the senses. It affects the mental and moral side of nature.

Alcohol users show death rates of 20 per cent greater than nonusers.

THE PRIME CAUSE.

Chicago's recently appointed morals commission will, it is said, study the city's vice problem and find ways and means to solve it—will "investigate causes and devise methods of prevention." This is another blow for the saloon. There can be no investigation into causes of vice and disease which will not show that the liquor traffic does more than anything else to produce and foster all phases of immorality.

VALUES IN MAINE.

The valuation of Maine increased in 1914 by the substantial sum of $9,503,696. There was an increase of $741,071 in the value of live stock; and an increase of $695,991 in the value of automobiles. The total valuation of automobiles was $4,047,516; live stock, $17,961,690. The total valuation for the state is $439,529,198. This if divided among the population would give every one of the 742,371 inhabitants $592.50 each.

NEW WAGON NOT NEEDED.

In one West Virginia town it is reported they ordered a new automobile police patrol just before the new liquor law went into effect. It was not delivered for some weeks and after seeing the result of the new law they cancelled the order, saying that the old horse-drawn vehicle could do all the work necessary.

Of this amount 160,434 bushels were marketed in the southern four tiers of counties, 54,944 in the central counties and 8,971 in the northern counties and upper peninsula.

The estimated total number of bushels of wheat marketed in the nine months August-April is 10,015,290 and the quantity yet remaining in possession of growers after deducting 2,000,000 bushels used for seed and home consumption is 2,000,000 bushels. Fifty mills, elevators and grain dealers report no wheat marketed in April.

Regular meeting May 15th, with Worthy Master Heller in the chair, attendance good, and over 25 visitors, including six members from Wilson Grange and Mr. U. C. Zelluff and part of his class in agriculture from the East Jordan High school. One application was received for membership. At the next meeting two candidates will receive the first and second degrees. After the business session, grange closed for a short recess, after which Mr. Zelluff's class entertained the grange by talks on poultry, pruning and grafting, the diseases of the potato, spray material and spraying, including one song and recitation. The grange ladies served coffee and cake. Mr. Zelluff is certainly doing good work as agricultural teacher. Next meeting of the grange May 29. A good attendance is desired.

Additional Locals

H. C. Carlsen of Petoskey spent Sunday in the city.

Bert VanAllsburg of Petoskey was in the city Wednesday, calling on old friends.

Mrs. Arthur Staley and little Audrey of Detroit, arrived Tuesday for a week's visit with her parents, Mr. and Mrs. S. H. Smith.

R. A. Emrey and family and Capt. Geo. Weaver and family attended the funeral of Miss Kate Harris, daughter of J. M. Harris, at Boyne City Wednesday.

Dr. A. F. McGreevy's advertisement in this issue that he will treat all horses brought to his office on 104 Antrim street absolutely free of charge on Saturday of this week. Read his adv. on page 4.

No killing frost has been reported in the immediate vicinity of Charlevoix, but in the eastern part of the county heavy frosts have fallen during the past cold nights and considerable loss of fruits, etc., has resulted.

Friends of Mrs. Charles Peaslee, who underwent an operation at the Petoskey hospital about two weeks ago, will be glad to learn that she is rapidly recovering and will soon be able to be removed to her home in this city.

Memorial Day will be generally observed in Charlevoix on Monday, May 31, the national holiday coming on Sunday. Service will be held next Sunday in the Baptist church, to be followed by a general observance on the 31st. Details and program will be published in our next issue.

Capt. George Weaver states that he has the Fannie M. Rose ready for the Boyne City-Charlevoix run and will start in on the regular schedule Thursday morning. The boat has been thoroughly cleaned and repainted during the past week, and while not as large as the City of Boyne, will nicely handle the traffic between the two cities.

H. H. Goodwin of Walloon Lake, died Saturday at Detroit, where he had been taken for treatment. Mr. Goodwin was the organizer and general manager of the Citizens' Mutual Fire Insurance company of Emmet, Charlevoix and Cheboygan counties, and was well known in this city. The body was brought back from Detroit Tuesday, where interment took place.

Under the leadership of L. C. Vineyard, pastor of the Baptist church, one hundred members of that organization will take a church census of Charlevoix, the object of the movement being to place the church in close touch with the general condition of the city, and to be able to help those who are in need of assistance at the time when most needed. The canvass will be held Tuesday afternoon of next week, and the public is asked to render all assistance possible in the movement.

How to Use Empty Baking Powder Cans.

If the empty baking powder cans are saved and the lids pierced with holes they may be utilized for a number of household purposes. They make excellent soap suds dispensers, which, filled with the small pieces of soap, they may be filled with soap powder and used for cleaning dust. They are also very handy in the laundry as sprinklers.

STUDY OF SOILS.

Knowledge That is Necessary for Intelligent Farming.

It is surprising how seldom the average landowner stops in question or shows the slightest curiosity as to what caused certain crops to achieve success and what helped others to entire failure, writes Edward K. Parkinson in the New York Evening Post. A little administrative machinery, a small outlay on proper garden soil or a little irrigation for a parched plain will sometimes turn failure on the land into triumph for us and solve the problem quite satisfactorily.

But there is a lack of the most elementary knowledge—or shall we call it interest?—as to definite agricultural ideas and plans, to be noted in large sections of this country, as is evidenced by our reputation abroad for being extravagant, bumptious and careless farmers. Now, to the unsatisfactory difference in soils is merely a difference in color. One is a deep chocolate brown, another is a light brown or a third is of a yellowish texture. In reality these differences in color are plain indications to the discerning that certain components of a soil predominate. For illustration, a freshly turned furrow in a soil where clay predominates will be grayish, while if it were what is known as a loamy soil it would have the color of light chocolate.

Thus the leading characteristics of soils should of necessity be studied, for only by understanding something of the physical composition of soil in our gardens is it possible to apply fertilizer intelligently and so avoid confusion and hopeless guesswork.

All varieties of soil may be divided into two great classes, according to the method of their formation—"sedentary" and "transported." Sedentary soils are those formed by the weathering of rocks in the places where the soil is found or from the accumulation of organic matter, as, for instance, in marshes. Transported soils are made up of materials which have been moved by some agency, such as water, ice or wind, to the place they now occupy.

To know just how to treat these soils one must be familiar with the components of soils—namely, sand, silt, clay and humus—and the combinations in which they are usually found.

Making the Little Farm Pay

By C. C. BOWSFIELD

The growing of crops for seed is becoming highly profitable in a number of localities and is a commendable feature of farm industry for any good, careful, systematic man to introduce and practice in connection with his other farm duties. There has never been a more opportune time for taking up this work. In the first place, this is a good thing to do as a matter of economy and protection for one's own crop interests. In the next place, the multiplicity of opportunities for putting good corn or other seed on exhibition so it will become an educational force and tend to better agriculture makes the growing of farm seeds desirable.

Miss Mamie M. Griffith of St. Clair county, Mo., is making her farm profitable by raising English blue grass for seed. This product pays well as a hay crop. "I think so much of English blue grass as a money maker and as a fertilizer," said Miss Griffith in discussing the blue of farming in which she has specialized with such marked success, "that I am planning to get the greater part of my farm seeded down, and especially I am working on weak or soil which has had successive corn crops."

"English blue grass is, in my opinion, one of the most important crops to be grown, for there are so many sources of advantage. It is a paying proposition from any point of view. The seed is always in demand and commands a good price, generally bringing from 13 to 22 cents per bushel. "After raising seed worth $20 to $25, an acre we have the pasture left to stock. Another advantage is that this seed grows very early and is ready for one seedling. This means a decided saving of seed and labor."

GROWING BEED CORN

Miss Griffith finds great pleasure as well as profit in her work and is an ardent advocate of the back to the farm movement, especially for women.

During the season of 1912 a farm in Mitchell county, Ia., produced 20,000 bushels of milnase from twenty-seven acres. Single acres produced as high as 1,000 bushels, but a raid of the onion maggot upon one side of the field cut down the average. The soil used was heavily enriched, but it had been cropped in onions for years.

About thirty years ago the owners of this farm went to Iowa and contracted for forty acres of land near town, going into debt to the extent of $4,000. The neighbors called them crazy. Since that time they have been offered $10,000 an acre for this same forty, but have refused it. For ten years they have secured a gross return from this land of $15,000, or an income of over 18 per cent upon a valuation of $2,000 per acre.

One of the secrets of their success is to have the land very rich. Originally it was a black loam, with about 2 per cent of sand; six feet down limestone. The land is manured with well rotted barnyard refuse every year. It is plowed about eight inches deep, and a subsoiler is used in the bottom of the furrow to loosen up three or four inches deeper. Then the harrow is run on and kept going until the surface is perfectly level and the soils thoroughly fine. In fact, it is as mellow as the proverbial ash heap.

Onion seed is planted in rows, which are placed fourteen inches apart. The seeds are dropped about six inches apart in the row. It requires one and one-half pounds to plant an acre. This method results in no waste of seed, and the back breaking work of thinning is not needed.

It is rare that any hand weeding is found necessary. The use of the wheel hoe and band cultivator is persistent, particularly in the early part of the season. Careful figuring shows that the 1912 crop was produced at a cost of 8 cents per bushel. After the first seed was secured the farm produced its own seed. The largest profits are always secured on those which keep best for growing the seed. By doing this a strain has been developed which is not only large, but keeps well into the following summer, with practically no loss from sprouting. A part of the business now is to grow onion seed for sale in large quantities.

FOR THE COOK.

How to Carry Out These Recipes For an Economical Meal.

Clam Frappe.
Cold Meat Warmers in Casserole.
Lima Beans with Sweet Potato Surprise.
Lemon Meringue Pudding.

Clam Frappe.
Wash two dozen clams thoroughly and put them in a stewpan with half a cup of cold water. Cover closely and steam until the shells open. Strain the liquid and freeze to a mush. A small amount may be easily frozen in a baking powder can by setting it in a tin pan and packing with ice and salt in equal proportions. The mixture will freeze in about half an hour and should be stirred once or twice during the freezing. Serve in glasses.

Cold Meats Warmers in Casserole.
Cold roast lamb, beef, veal, chicken kidneys, etc., may be heated up deliciously in the casserole. Heat any gravy that is left over to almost boiling point and then put in slices of lamb or beef and let them get warmed through. Do not cook them. In the absence of gravy a rich beef juice could be used. For boiled or fried chicken have ready some boiled rice and put this first in the casserole. Take off the skin of the chicken and bone it; place the bits on top of the rice, pour over gravy or bits of butter, add seasoning if needed and a dust of curry powder. Then cover the casserole and let the rice and chicken heat to the cooking point. When heating the lamb and beef slices the casserole must not be covered, as the steam tenderizes the meat.

Sweet Potato Surprise.
Season two cupfuls of baked sweet potatoes that have been pressed through a colander with salt and pepper, and add a beaten egg and a little hot cream. Form into balls, and into each press a pitted prune into which two walnut meats have been forced. This prime should not be visible. Dip the balls in crumbs and egg. Then brown the potato balls in deep fat, drain and serve at once.

Lemon Meringue Pudding.
Add a tablespoonful of butter, a cupful of sugar, two heaping teaspoonfuls of cornstarch dissolved in a little cold water and the juice and grated rind of two lemons to a quart of boiling water. Beat the yolks of three eggs and add to the boiling mixture. Pour into a baking dish and bake in a pan of water until the custard is set. Make a meringue of the whipped whites of the eggs and add two or three tablespoonfuls of granulated sugar, beating in well. Brown, chill and serve.

How to Clean Soiled Wall Paper.
The following mixture is more easily applied and does the work more effectively than any of the faded preparations that are sold at a good price for a small quantity, one generally paying the sum for the label and tin to box it up for sale.

Take one part sal ammoniac, four parts rye flour and water enough to form a dough; then use on the soiled parts as if the mixture was a sponge. As the dirt is transferred from the wall to the cleaner turn the soil in and work out a clean part of the mixture. A little practice will soon show how easily this is accomplished with out waste to the mixture. Never continue rubbing the soiled surface of the cleaner into the wall.

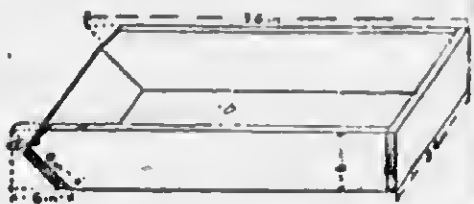

value of Sheep Manure.

In ten tons of solid and liquid sheep manure there are 250 pounds of nitrogen, 81 pounds of phosphoric acid and 241 pounds of potash. In the same amount of cattle manure there are only 87 pounds of nitrogen, 17 pounds of phosphoric acid and 51 pounds of potash. These figures are sufficient in themselves to show why the foot of the sheep is golden to the land.

Mixing Box For Wet Mash.

A poultry keeper who feeds one to three pails of wet mash daily will find that a 30 by 24 by 12 inch box, consisting of a sheet zinc nailed to the under edges of four wooden sides, is a great time saver, says a contributor to the Orange Judd Farmer. It provides an ideal surface to shovel on as well as being moisture proof and sanitary. The long sides and one end are perpendicular to the zinc bottom, but the other end flares outward at an angle of 45 degrees.

The wood used may be white pine, cypress, yellow pine or whitewood. To give the box the required solidity the sides are one and one-quarter inch plank, but the end boards need only be of seven-eighths inch stock. The materials necessary for one box are as follows: One sheet zinc, 32 by 24 inches; sixteen screws, one and one-half inches long; one-half pound of wire lath nails; one piece of planed plank 6 by 6 by 1 1/2 inches and one piece of planed board 4 by 6 by 3/4 inches.

A larger sized box, measuring 48 by 36 by 7 inches, will easily hold four to seven pails of mash for mixing. I have tried out this larger size and found it very efficient. The great saving of initial cost over that of a power mixer is a strong argument in its favor. One man can mix a seven pail feed of mash in less than fifteen minutes with this simple equipment.

Japanese Tapestry.

For centuries Japanese weavers in silk have been famed for their exquisite tapestry work, or tsuzureashiki, as it is known in the native tongue. Nowhere are more artistic productions wrought, and along certain lines the Japanese workman, with his tiny handloom, creates a tapestry which no other race has so far equaled. How long Japan has been cultivating the art of weaving pictures from silk and gold in this manner is not accurately known, but some of the national specimens of silk brocade are very old, and it is altogether likely that the art has been known since Japan's first acquaintance with China in the very remote past.

CHARLEVOIX COURIER

VOL. 33. NUMBER 21

CHARLEVOIX, MICHIGAN, WEDNESDAY, MAY 26, 1915

PRICE $1.50 PER YEAR

C. H. S. WINNER FOR THIRD TIME

Wins Out for Three Successive Years in in Y. M. C. A. Track Meet.

Nineteen local men entered in track events—Track in bad condition.

For the third successive time Charlevoix High School won the Charlevoix County Y. M. C. A. Track Meet last Saturday at the race track, Boyne City, in a decisive manner. The track was heavy and no records altered, although the men did some excellent work in many of the events. The two relay cups were captured by Boyne City in two of the finest and tightest races ever pulled off on a cinder path in Northern Michigan. The final school grades were Charlevoix 2.02, East Jordan 1.75 and Boyne City 1.30.

The Y. M. C. A. county meet evidently has been living under the spell of a jinx since its inauguration three seasons ago. Every year cold weather, rain and a heavy track have hampered the county lads and drove away a very great chance for the displaying of much class and the setting of very many records. This year the same conditions existed, and although giving forth every ounce of strength, the athletes were unable to overcome the handicap.

Without question the two relays, the heavy weight and light weight, were the most exciting races that have ever been run in this part of the state. The heavy weight race, from the pistol to the finish, was a neck and neck affair, and only the fact that Charlevoix lost its place on the track allowed Boyne City to beat on the final lap. In the light weight East Jordan, who previously held the cup, was forced to take third place at the tape. The finest display of real determination to overcome a handicap was shown by Arnold of the local high school, who, starting six yards behind on the second lap, evened the affair. The race was won by an arm's length.

In the high jump, Shapton was the surprise of the day, clearing the bar at five feet and one inch. This jump won the event easily, as neither Boyne City or East Jordan had men going in the vicinity of the five-foot mark. Parsons won first place in the running broad jump, clearing 16 feet, 11 inches, and Taggart captured the 220 dash in 26 3-5 seconds. In the dashes Charlevoix was especially strong, winning first place in the majority of the heats. The weights and dashes were the only weak spots, and in these the men entered made an excellent showing.

Charlevoix put 19 men on the track Saturday morning and it was a source of comment to the win in which these few men set about to win the event if possible. Although losing the much coveted relay cup, the meet came in this direction, and for this latter fact the men are to be encouraged. Every man of the team fought to the end and many have been rewarded accordingly.

The highest point winner of the day was Lefler of Boyne City, who received an average of all events entered, 76 4-5. Tooley of Boyne City was second high man with 71 3-5, and Shapton of Charlevoix third, with 71 2-3. Boyne City had 12 men receiving silver medals, Charlevoix 9 and East Jordan 4. The silver medals are awarded to those who reach a certain standard in all events entered. The highest point winner will be given a gold medal. Those receiving silver medals from Charlevoix are as follows: Olney, O'Neill, Shapton, Van Allsburg, Pierce, Schweitzer, Taggart, Walker and Krulik.

PASS BILLS OVER GOVERNOR'S HEAD

Representative McMillan Tells of Work at the State Capitol.

Returned to Lansing Monday to Pass New Primary Bill—Highway Law Changed.

Representative H. L. McMillan of East Jordan was in the city Saturday, on his way home from Lansing, where he attended the return meeting of the legislature, and to The Courier he told of the work of that body during this short meeting.

In addition to the passing of five bills which Governor Ferris had vetoed, over the head of the chief executive, they sent a note to the governor asking that he either approve or disapprove the Nank primary bill. Back came the reply from the governor that he would take his own good time.

The time limit for consideration of the primary bill would be up at noon the following Monday, and the legislature had passed a concurrent resolution making Friday the day of final adjournment, but on receiving the governor's reply they voted to reconsider the concurrent resolution, and set Tuesday, May 25, the day of final adjournment. If Governor Ferris vetoes (and late reports state that he has) the primary bill, the legislature decided to meet on Tuesday and pass it over his head, and it will become a law without his approval.

The main features of the new primary bill is that it requires that where a candidate's name is written into a primary ballot, it must have the votes of five per cent of the qualified voters at the last preceding election before it can legally go on the election ballot.

The law also provides that each party ballot be printed separately, doing away with the blanket ballot, and in the booth each voter calls for the ticket he wants and that enrolls him under the proper party head.

Representative McMillan also stated that the state highway law was fixed so that the reward road work done in 1915 can command pay the same as any other. The printing bill was remodeled so that poll books do not have to be printed at Lansing and sent out blank sixty days previous to election.

GRANDFATHER VET SPEAKS

Hold on! Hold on! My goodness, you take my breath, my son, A firm questions at me, like shots from a Gatlin' gun. Why do I wear this eagle an' flag an' brazen star, An' why do my old eyes glisten when somebody mentions war, And why do I call men "comrades" and why do my eyes grow bright When you hear me tell your grandma, I'm goin' to post to-night? Come here, you inquisitive rascal, an' set on your granddaddy's knee. An' I'll try an' answer the broadsides you've been a-firin' at me.

Away back thar, in the sixties, and long afore you were born, The news come a-flashin' to us, one bright an' sunny morn, That some of our Southern brothers, a-thinkin' no doubt 'twas right, Had trailed their guns on our banner, an' opened a nasty fight. The great big guns were a-boomin', an' shot flyin' thick an' fast, An' troops all over the sotland war rapidly hein' masses, An' a thrill went through the nation, a fear that our glorious land Might be split an' divided an' ruined by mistaken brothers' hand.

Lord, but wa'n't there excitement, an' didn't the boys' eyes flash? An' didn't we curse our brothers fur bein' so foolish an' rash? An' didn't we raise the neighbors with loud an' continued cheers, When Abe sent out a dockment a-callin' fur volunteers. An' didn't we flock to the colors when the drums began to beat, An' didn't we march with proud step along this village street? An' didn't the people cheer us when we got aboard the cars, With the flag a-wavin' o'er us, and went away to the wars?

I'll never forget your grandma as she stood outside o' the train, Her face as white as the snow drift, her tears a-fallin' like rain; She stood thar' quiet and deathlike, 'mid all o' the rush an' noise For the war war' takin' her, her husband and three brave boys, Bill, Charley, and little Tommy—just turned eighteen, but as true An' gallant a little soldier as ever wore the blue.

It seemed almost like murder for to tear her poor heart so, But your granddaddy couldn't stay, baby, and the boys were determined to go.

The evenin' afore we started she called the boys to her side An' told 'em how they war' always their mother's joy an' pride, An' though her soul was in torture, an' her poor heart bleedin' an' sore, An' though she needed her darlings, their country needed 'em more. She told 'em to do their duty whar'ever their feet might roam, An' to never forget in battle their mother war prayin' at home, An' if (an' the tears high choked her) they should fall in front o' the foe, She'd go to her blessed Saviour an' ax Him to lighten the blow.

Bill lays and waits the summons 'neath Spottsylvania's sod, An' on the field of Antietam, Charley's spirit went back to God; An' Tommy, our baby Tommy, we buried one starlit night Along with his fallen comrades, just after the Wilderness fight. The lightning struck our family tree, an' stripped it of every limb, A-leavin' only this bare old trunk, a-standin' alone, and grim.

My boy, that's why your granddaddy, when you kneel to the God you love, Makes you ax Him to watch your uncles, an' make 'em happy above. That's why you sometimes see her with tear-drops in her eyes, That's why you sometimes catch her a-tryin' to hide her sighs, That's why at our great reunions she looks so solemn and sad, That's why her heart seems a-breakin' when the boys are so jolly an' glad; That's why you sometimes find her in the bedroom overhead, Down on her knees a-prayin' with their pictures laid out on the bed; That's why the old-time brightness will light up her face no more, Till she meets her hero warriors in the camp on the other shore.

An' when the great war was over, back came the veterans true, With not one star a-missin' from the azure field of blue, An' the boys, who, on field of battle had stood the fiery test, Formed post o' the great Grand Army in the North, South, East and West, Fraternity, Charity, Loyalty, is the motto 'neath which they train, Their object to care for the helpless, an' banish sorrow an' pain From the homes o' the widows an' 'orphans o' the boys who have gone before.

To answer their names at Roll Call in the great Grand Army Corps. That's why we wear these badges, the eagle an' flag an' star, Worn only by veterana heroes who fought in that bloody war, An' that's why my old eyes glisten when talkin' about the fray, An' that's why I call men "Comrade" when I meet 'em every day, An' that's why I tell your Grandma "I'm goin' to post tonight," For fella's whar I meet the old boys who stood with me in the light, And, my child, that's why I've taught you to reverence and love the men Who come here a-wearin' badges to fight those battles again.

They are all the gallant heroes who stood 'mid the shot an' shell, An' followed the flyin' colors right into the mouth o' hell. They are the men whose valor saved the land from disgrace an' shame, An' lifted her back in triumph to her perch on the dome o' fame, An' as long as you live, my darling, till your pale lips in death are mute, When you see that badge on a bosom, take off your hat an' salute; An' if any ol' vet should halt you, an' question why you do, Just tell him you've a right to, fur your granddaddy's a comrade too.

"Don't Fuss Up" Advises Keeler

"Don't fuss up," is the word of State Superintendent of Public Instruction Keeler to the June graduates.

Supt. Keeler wants to see the June commencement exercises devoid of all frills this year and the dress of boy and girl graduates as modest as possible. There's a reason. Mr. Keeler is of the opinion that that the time has been reached in Michigan when the rich should condescend to allow their children graduates to dress more in keeping with those who are not rich enough in this world's goods to afford finery for such occasion.

He says that with all the domestic science teaching being done in the schools that he thinks it not a bad idea for the girls this year to make their own dresses.

"Few June graduates in the state are children of wealthy parents who can afford the fine dresses and clothes for them," says Keeler. "It would make matters so much better if a happy medium could be reached this year and the swell clothes done away with."

Moves to Atlanta.

"I read about old friends and acquaintances every week in the Courier and anxiously look for its appearance every week. I have moved from Rochester to Atlanta, and want the paper sent to this address." The above is from B. B. Blair, former resident and well-known in the city, who disposed of his interests here about a year ago and moved to Rochester. Mr. and Mrs. Blair's many Charlevoix friends wish them success in abundance in their new location.

Wed Early But Not Too Often Assert Experts

In the Spring, When Young Man's Fancies, Etc.—Hop to the Little Church.

In the spring, a young man's fancy—and a maid's—turns to thoughts of love, and thoughts of love lead to important ceremonies at the little church around the corner. Reports have been numerous this early in the season.

Alarmed by the number of youthful benedictions heard from in the last few weeks, authorities in large cities have been putting parents through their annual spring questioning on the marriage question.

Marry Early.

Marry early is the advice of Charlevoix experts on the subject, who frankly voiced their opinions when the subject was broached.

"I am a strong believer of love in a cottage," declared one city pastor today. "Early marriages are the most politic, but no general advice can be given. The right time to marry is when you find the right person to marry, and this generally happens before you are very old. The economic barrier to early marriage is greatly over estimated. I sincerely believe that two young people who are truly mated, can live to better advantage together than separately."

Age? Oh, Any!

"It is hard to determine just the right age," said a Charlevoix physician, "but

I think in most cases 21 or 22 is old enough. The great thing is love, however. Some might be developed mentally and physically at an earlier age, and some at a later age than I have named, but if the two love each other, age should not be a barrier.

Don't Be Foolish.

"If either of the two young people have a career planned, it is foolish for them to marry until the career is attained, but if the man is employed at a steady position and expects to hold that position for some time, there is no use delaying marriage. It is well to marry before the tastes are fixed, so the two can develop their lives together. For a young man who is boarding and rooming, a home is the best thing in the world to keep him from sowing any wild oats."

Has Right Time.

"Between 20 and 25 is the right age to marry, for at that age men and women are naturally fitted for the marriage state," said a Catholic priest. "A woman is fully developed mentally and physically at 20, and a man a little later, so there is no reason why they shouldn't marry then. As far as history goes, it is known that is that is the average age of marriage. "Circumstances alter cases. You can't make rules after love, but in my judgment, between 25 and 30 is the most opportune age to get married," said a county judge.

OF LOCAL INTEREST

Some People We Know, and We Will Profit by Hearing About Them.

This is a purely local event. It took place in Charlevoix. Not in some faraway place. You are asked to investigate it. Asked to believe a citizen's word. To confirm a citizen's statement. Any article that is endorsed at home is more worthy of confidence. Than one you know nothing about. Endorsed by unknown people.

J. B. Lancaster, 203 May St., Charlevoix, says: "I suffered for seven years with weak kidneys. My back ached at night and when I got up in the morning, I was stiff and lame. The kidney secretions passed too frequently and my rest was broken. I got Doan's kidney pills at the Ivy Drug Store and they did me a world of good. I can rest better at night, my back is stronger and the aches and pains are gone."

HUERTA, HARLEM LANDLORD.

Dictator Puts Mexican Bonds into New York Flat Houses.

By putting $300,000 in Mexican bonds into six Harlem apartment houses General Huerta has become a New York landlord. It is said.

The houses are six-story structures at 117 to 123 West One Hundred and Forty-first street and 126 to 132 West One Hundred and Forty-second street. They cover part of the old Watt farm tract, which was sold two years ago by the Phibney estate.

Title to the property was transferred not long ago to Francis C. Mason of Wilkesburg, Pa., but when payment was made it was learned that he represented John De Kay, a close friend of Huerta. The $300,000 stands for the buyer's equity above mortgages aggregating $1,057,000. The bonds were part of an issue of $20,000,000 issued during the Huerta regime.

OPIUM IN CHRIST'S DRINK.

Given to Relieve Sufferings on Cross, Says Savant.

Christ was given an opiate as he suffered on the cross, Dr. Paul Haupt, professor of Semitic languages in Johns Hopkins university, told the American Philosophical society in a paper on "Opium in the Bible."

"Gall with wine" proffered the Saviour, as told in Matthew xxvii, 34, indicated, by strict interpretation, he said, a bitter and opium. "Myrrh," gold of in Mark xv, 23, denoted the drug.

"The Talmud," the professor declared, "states that a cup of wine with libanum" was given criminals before their execution. Libanum means incense, as a rule, but in this case it was used for opium."

Lee's Retreat From Gettysburg

ONE of the most dramatic incidents of the civil war was the retreat of Lee's army after Gettysburg, with its hundreds of wagon loads of wounded soldiers.

A woman who lived by the road down which this long line of screaming groaning and dying men was being hauled said that it was the most awesome event of her life. They went by her home during the night.

But even the wounded had to make way for the guns. When the artillery came thundering along the road the officers in command of it forced the wagons loaded with wounded to give them the right of way, which was done.

A good many of the thousands of the Union wounded at Gettysburg were taken to Philadelphia war hospitals by railroad trains. The nearly 6,000 dead in blue and gray who lay on the sunny fields at Gettysburg gave the opposing armies far less worry than did the hosts of wounded.

Not "Decoration" Day.

Of late years, many persons have referred to Memorial day as "Decoration day." It was so named many years ago by the Grand Army of the Republic as a day upon which tribute is paid to the memory of the men who served in the Union army in the war for the preservation of the Union, and the Confederate veterans now celebrate similar days in honor of the memory of the brave men who fought upon the other side. "Memorial day" is correct.

An Echo of the Civil War.

A resolution was adopted recently by the Vermont legislature commending Mrs. Bettie Van Metre of Berryville, Va., for her care of Lieutenant Redell of Westfield, Vt., in the civil war. Lieutenant Redell's leg was broken by a shell in a battle at Opequon, Va., and he was left behind by his regiment. He was picked up unconscious and carried to the home of a family whose southern sympathies were so strong that he was left in an attic room for three days without proper care until Mrs. Van Metre, then a girl of twenty years, found his condition and insisted on seeing as nurse. She watched over him, regardless of the criticism of her friends, until he was able to be moved back to his home.

A Day Generally Observed.

Memorial day, May 30, is a legal holiday in all of the states save Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, North Carolina, South Carolina and Texas. The southern states have Confederate memorial days on various dates.

ZUDORA In the Twenty Million Dollar Mystery

By HAROLD MACGRATH

Copyright, 1914 and 1915, by Harold MacGrath

SYNOPSIS.

Zudora is left an orphan at an early age. Her father is killed in a gold mine. Zudora and the fortune from the mine, which grows to be worth $200,000, are left in the guardianship of Frank Keena. Zudora's mother's brother, who has set himself up as a Hindu mystic and is known as Hassam Ali, decides that Zudora must die before she can have a chance to come into possession of her money, so that it may be left to him, the next of kin. Hassam Ali uses an obstacle to his scheme in the person of John Storm, a young lawyer, for whom Zudora has taken a fancy, and he commands the girl to put the man out of her mind. Zudora insists that if she cannot marry Storm she will marry no one.

"Well, well," says Hassam Ali, "solve my next twenty cases and you can marry him; fail in a single case and you must renounce him."

Zudora unravels a mystery and wins her first case—a case in which John Storm is saved from being convicted of a murder instigated by Hassam Ali himself.

Zudora and Hassam Ali visit Nahok Khan's house, where sleep overcomes every one whenever Nahok attempts to marry a princess. Storm, seeking Zudora, is made a prisoner. Zudora follows Nahok Khan, restores the princess to her original lover and saves Storm from death.

A maker of diamonds tells Hassam Ali his secret. Storm informs Zudora that his life is being attempted frequently. Storm suspects Hassam Ali. Storm is arrested for stealing the diamond maker's gems, but Zudora discovers the real thieves—a pair of mice.

The negro help employed on Storm's father's farm are feeling because a great skeleton hand appears at night upon a hill near by. Storm is baffled in his investigation, but Zudora learns that her uncle has employed Jimmy Bolton, a half-witted man, thus to annoy Storm's parents. Zudora finds Bolton operating a big magic lantern and is attacked by him. Storm appears and saves her.

Hassam Ali asks Zudora to find a gem lost by two mysterious old men. Zudora gets a photograph of the gem and it turns in her hand. An old house is mined by Hassam Ali and the old men. Storm and Zudora are lured there and narrowly escape destruction when the house blows up.

John McWint, endeavoring to trap and kill George Smith, is killed himself, and Smith is charged with murder. Hassam Ali conspires to have John Storm meet the same fate as McWint, and he and Storm are overcome by powerful fumes. Zudora saves them, proves that McWint's own dog trapped and killed him and saves Smith from a band of lynchers.

An inventor blows up a submarine with a powerful heat ray which he sends through water. Hassam Ali sends Zudora to a photographer directly beneath the inventor's laboratory and orders the inventor to kill her. Zudora gets a warning, and her life is saved. The heat ray melts the mine shaft, and the photographer, after a quarrel with Hassam Ali, is found dead in the river.

Wu Chung prevents Zudora's elopement with John Storm by hypnotizing her, and he and Hassam Ali attempt to smuggle her out of the country. This plot is frustrated by Storm.

Hassam Ali's double, falls in love with Zudora. Baird and Mme. Du Val kidnap Zudora and the Van Wick child. Storm rescues them, and Hassam Ali dies.

With Hassam Ali dead Zudora is released of her pledge to solve twenty cases. She confronts, however, the greatest mystery of all, which is the mystery of her own life, and the ambition to secure the vast fortune of $200,000 left to her. This great photo serial is being shown in the leading motion picture theaters by the Thanhouser Film Corporation. Among those participating are Marguerite Snow, Mary Elizabeth Forbes, James Cruze, in the new role of reporter-hero, Sidney Bracey and Frank Farrington.

On looking through her uncle's papers Zudora finds that her father left her an interest in a diamond mine, and Storm and Baird both lend assistance in trying to regain for her possession of this estate which is being appropriated by rogues under the leadership of Mme. Du Val. They plan to frighten Zudora so that she will run away. Failing, they kidnap Zudora and Howard, the mine superintendent, and put them in a private insane asylum. Howard dies, but Zudora, nearly famished, is rescued by Storm and his friends. Detective Hunt and Baird find the Zudora and mine.

Mrs. Capshaw's jewels are stolen, but recovered through the cleverness of Hunt and Baird. They investigate the mysteries of Mme. Du Val's house. A map of a mine is stolen from Zudora.

CHAPTER XVII.

The Island of Mystery.

URING one of his visits as La Fontaine, the artist, Detective Hunt was fortunate enough to secure a copy of the new diamond mine which Radcliffe had purchased from Zudora's room. But his best efforts failed to find the secret of the mine's fate. It was something to know, however, that valuable papers reposed in it. Sooner or later he knew that he would overcome the obstacle of the secret spring. Hunt sent the copy immediately to Zudora, and one day she and Storm paid the detective a visit.

"Suppose we could locate this find," suggested Storm. "We could stake it out and make it legally Zudora's automatically as a new found claim."

"But this map gives us only one end of the survey," replied Hunt. "The rogues have just as good a chance as we have."

"But if we should start first?" said Zudora.

"You want me to go to Africa?" "If you will. It would be the greatest pleasure in the world to cut under their feet," went on Zudora. "I know of nothing that would please me more than to set up a claim next door to the old mine and make it my own."

"Why not being the whole business into court and have done with it?" asked Storm.

"You have told me repeatedly that we would lose," she answered.

mines would still be under their control. No, Miss Keena, we've got to keep away from the courts until we have the goods on those fine birds. I'll go to Africa, but on one condition."

"What's that?"

"That I can take Jim Baird along with me. He's familiar with the ground."

"We would be glad to have him go with you."

"Wait until I call him up," said Hunt, reaching for the telephone. Presently he hooked the receiver and turned to Zudora with a smile. "Africa it is. Baird says he will be glad to go with me. Now, listen to my advice. While I'm gone you two children stay "Wait until I call him up," said Hunt at home as much as possible. Don't answer any strange letters. If you should receive one from either Baird or myself saying that we were in trouble, tear it up and sit tight. Promise?"

"I promise," said Zudora.

"Honest Injun?"

"Honest Injun," she laughed.

"All right—I'll let you know when we sail. But you mustn't come down to see us off. We are being watched all the time."

On the following day Hunt and Baird entered a looking office and applied for tickets for Cape Town.

"What do you think about it, Hunt?"

"A wild goose chase, but there is always the possibility of something turning up. If that superintendent was alive he could help us. We've just got to trust to luck. But I'll tell you this much, Baird, I'm in this affair to the hilt. I'm going to win, blind. I feel it in my bones that if I can get the right stuff I can break up the big gang smuggling gang in the country. They are all clever, well educated. They can walk in luck without bringing any of it away. And when we do throw the net there mustn't be a hole large enough for a perch sparrow to swim through."

There was one thing the conspirators did regularly, and that was to search once a week the South African sailing lists. Sometimes Radcliffe performed this service, sometimes Bruce, sometimes Mme. Du Val herself. So one day, when Bruce was making the rounds, he came across the two names he jumped into a taxi and spun away to the Du Val villa to acquaint the address with the news.

"Hunt and Baird are off to South Africa on Saturday," he announced. "This means new stunts for us. They're having a good deal of luck, if you want my opinion, and with no one to stop them. They may, I fancy, upon some day, win the whole. What shall we do?"

"We can win it all, if we're smart," said Bruce. "We can win it all, if we're smart."

said madame. "We'll talk it over when he comes. If we move at all it must be at the same time as they move."

And Radcliffe when he arrived readily agreed with this. He had no desire to leave the comforts of New York, and he growled not a little, but he realized that he had no choice.

"With Hunt and Baird out of the way I might be able to induce Zudora to take a vacation," suggested madame. "She has benten me a dozen times, and it ruffles."

"Sult yourself about that. What's the matter with sending her to visit Beggar Mary at Craig Island? There's no need now of putting her out of the way for good."

"But we could make good terms with the enemy if we had Zudora where we wanted her."

"Well, that's in your hands. Come on, Bruce. We may find it difficult to get decent looking."

"On a South Africa trip? Leave that to me. But we must agree upon some corking good makeup if we are to escape the old hawk eyes of Hunt."

On the day of departure Hunt said to Baird that it would be wise to make up acquaintances in the smoke room. They both played chess, and they could very well while away the time at this pursuit without any outside assistance. With equal cunning Radcliffe impressed Bruce with the fact that they had better dine in their staterooms and keep off the promenade deck as much as possible. They both might escape a casual glance from Hunt, but there was small need of courting discovery by laughing around in the vicinity of the old thief taker.

The voyage was uneventful. Six weeks later Hunt and Baird arrived at the Zudora mine and set about the task of locating the second mine. One end of the survey they could locate, but whether it ran north, east or west remained for them to find out. They employed the services of an expert miner to spot "blue clay."

"I guess you chaps are up against it," he admitted after the first week. "From your map the claim might be ten or twenty miles north or east or west. What you have shown me is merely your man's starting point. You go somewhere from here, but where?"

"It's a wild goose chase, all right," replied Hunt. "But we had to find out for ourselves. And, by the way, Baird, have you noticed the man on "They'll follow us," said Radcliffe. crutches and the chap with the big beard we've been running into lately?"

"Yes; I've been watching them, and, what is more, they've been watching us."

"Same idea here. Well, let 'em watch. Much good it will do them."

"They'll probably carry away some gems. There is no injunction to hold the rogues in the least. Hunt, I'm sentimental about this deal," continued Baird gravely. "I want that girl to come into her own. There was a day when I made things mighty uncomfortable for her."

That night Bruce and Radcliffe indulged in a bottle of champagne. Hunt's mission to South Africa was a failure, and that was all they cared to know. The crutches of Bruce were neatly hollowed out and about ten or twelve fine stones secreted in each hollow, then filled with wax. Why pay duty to Uncle Sam when it wasn't at all necessary?

They went out to the mines for a final look about the next day and passed both Baird and Hunt.

"They'll follow us," said Radcliffe. "Let 'em. We'll play a joke on them. Fill up an old watch with pebbles. Hunt will have his eye peeled for a bit of smuggling, and we'll trip him up. He's not so wise as to look at the crutches."

Baird picked out Radcliffe to shadow, and the latter lured him to the window of the room. Radcliffe picked the watch out of the wastebasket, emptied it and enacted a little comedy for Baird's particular benefit. He replaced the pebbles, snuffed and dropped the watch into the basket again, then went on. Baird swallowed the bait quickly enough. He recovered the watch, but as he climbed out of the window he ran into Radcliffe, who grappled with him. Baird, however, managed to hit first and downed his opponent, who staggered to his feet, and with rage. He determined forthwith to put Baird out of the game for keeps.

There was a face and dime beyond the house, and Baird made for this, with Radcliffe at his heels. Baird had been armed he would have waited, but Radcliffe might do some real damage and he concluded that discretion was the better part of valor. Beyond the

It hardly seems possible that any Range could be used this length of time, but the following sworn affidavit of R. T. Mears states that he has used a Majestic Range in his home for this length of time, and that today, as far as he can see, the range is good for many years more of service. Read what he says about the Majestic:

State of Michigan,
County of Charlevoix, ss.

R. T. Mears, being duly sworn, deposes and says that he has used a Majestic Range in his home for the past twelve years. Deponent further swears that during this time he has spent but 75c for repairs on said Majestic Range, and that today the range is in splendid condition and shows but little evidence of its long usage. Deponent further says that during a greater portion of this time he has burned coal in the above mentioned range, and that he has never had to replace any of the parts of the fire box, and that the fire back is, from all that he can see, as good as ever.

R. T. MEARS.

Subscribed to before me this 18th day of May, A. D., 1915.

L. E. BENTON, Notary Public.

My commission expires July 13, 1915.

What better recommendation can a Range be given than that above by Mr. Mears for the Majestic.

Users of the Majestic from all parts of the country give testimony of the same nature. If you want a range that is a fuel saver, easy to operate, one that will LAST, the Majestic is the one to buy.

The Farmer is the Producer

A town-full of merchants might buy and sell among themselves for a year, and at the end be not a dollar richer in money or property. But let a community of farmers work their farms for a year and that community will be a great deal richer. The farmer does not merely handle money, he produces it—attracts it to the community from afar.

The Charlevoix County Bank realizes that the prosperity of Charlevoix depends greatly upon the farmer. It wants to see Charlevoix thrive. Then this bank will thrive. What can we do for you?

man following was a dangerous mad man and was attempting to kill him. "Ten pounds to carry me to the station," said Baird.

"But my orders are to wait for the express!"

"Well, you can go a few miles, drop me and return before the express arrives."

"I'm ready to do that," agreed the engineer.

As the train started Radcliffe managed to get aboard. He staggered into the coach where Baird was and a fierce hand to hand fight took place. The blood lust went to Baird's head also, and he fought to kill. What the result would have been no one can say, for the battle was strangely interrupted. A spread mill threw the engine off the track, and the whole train followed it down the embankment. Baird was stunned for a moment, but managed to get up and stagger away. The man Radcliffe appeared to be dead. So much the better, was Baird's opinion. He limped back to his lodgings and informed Hunt.

"We can't get anywhere," said Hunt. "We are only wasting time and money here! I've looked to sail Saturday. If these two look for the same boat I'll have their cuticle taken off and searched when we reach New York. Take it from me, they'll be up to the old game of smuggling in gems. If that bearded chap is dead, well and good. But you'll find that he was merely knocked senseless."

Entered at Charlevoix Postoffice as second class matter.

THE penny-wise and pound-foolish policy of an administration that saves at the spigot and wastes at the bung-hole, was illustrated again last week when the treasury department made an order placing 4,000 janitors, char-women and similar employees on an eight-day furlough in order to save a small portion of their already small pittance. Thus the Democratic pledge of economy has the beginning of its fulfillment. After appropriating large sums for new offices and commissions, and urging the appropriation of many millions for a dangerous ship-purchase scheme, and finding positions for sons and sons-in-law of members of the cabinet, the first step in economy is undertaken by cutting the compensation of the hardest worked and poorest paid of all the hundreds of thousands of government employees.

The order which has been made applies to every federal public building in the United States, for the care of all of which $2,650,000 is appropriated. The burden of the saving that the administration proposes to effect falls upon those who perform the service of sweeping, scrubbing, cleaning cuspidors, etc.

Naturally the inauguration of this discriminating and unfair scheme of economy has aroused a storm of criticism against the administration. The policy is particularly condemned because the administration has been extravagant in so many other respects where economy could have been practiced without detriment to the public service and without injury to individuals. For example, in numerous instances where the last administration had employed special counsel to conduct litigation in various parts of the United States, the present administration, without any charge of inefficiency, dismissed the attorneys who were conducting the cases and employed other attorneys who would necessarily have to study the facts and familiarize themselves with the law, such as attorneys being employed in some instances at higher salaries than the experienced men were receiving and without any apparent reason for the change, other than that the newly appointed ones were "deserving Democrats."

Other men have been appointed to high salaried positions in the government service with no apparent special qualification other than their relationship to the treasury, the secretary of state, and the secretary of the navy. Instead of practicing economy by saving the money paid to these officials, the administration chose to make its first move for the fulfillment of its economy pledge by taking tribute from the poorest paid public servants, who are frequently men and women of advanced age and in dire need of all the compensation they receive.

The act of the treasury department has served a valuable end, however, by calling public attention once more to the violation of the economy pledge. This subject received wide discussion at the last session of congress when the Democratic chairman of the house committee on appropriations condemned his own party for its extravagance, and showed that the excess of expenditures was due chiefly to the executive departments which had urged appropriations $113,000,000 in excess of the amount congress appropriated.

This incident has also served a further good end by forestalling the effort to set aside all other issues and secure public approval for the Wilson administration on the ground that it has not embroiled the United States in European war. The effort to win public approbation because of errors the administration does not commit, will fail because of its own acts which keep before the public its mistakes of a positive and affirmative nature.

The Benzie County Patriot, published at Frankfort, Michigan, is very flattered in its remarks concerning a K. of P. minstrel show recently held in that city, put on by local talent. One of Charlevoix's well known young men, Harker Kirby, had the minstrel in charge and in a great measure the success of the show was due to his management.

United States Leads World in Tobacco Growth and Consumption.

The United States is the greatest producer, the greatest exporter, the greatest importer and the greatest consumer of tobacco in the world, according to a report by the bureau of foreign and domestic commerce. The American production of tobacco leaf of all sorts averaged somewhat more than 1,000,000,000 pounds a year, valued at $100,000,000.

An enormous quantity is exported, exceeding in value such items as cotton manufactures, electrical machinery, paper and paper products and leather and leather manufactures.

The export trade was dislocated by the war, but the extra consumption by men in the trenches has practically taken it back to normal.

CAUGHT IN ACT OF SPEARING FISH

Game Warden Pearson Arrests Two Offenders Saturday Night.

Ed. Sandell and E. E. Brown, Coal and Ice Merchant, Arrested for Illegal Fishing.

Two East Jordan residents, one a well-known business man, were caught spearing speckled trout on the Jordan river Saturday night by Game Warden W. J. Pearson, and placed under arrest.

Many reports had reached the ears of the game warden regarding illegal fishing on the Jordan, and close watch had been kept on the stream. Saturday evening Under Sheriff Cook of East Jordan received a phone message from Game Warden Pearson to meet him at a certain place up the Jordan. Under Sheriff Cook, accompanied by J. H. Milford and Charles Murphy, went to the place designated and when Pearson arrived, the party began to make a search on the river for the violators.

Before the night was over, two men were seen coming down the river in a boat, spearing fish by jack light. They were ordered to row ashore and taken into custody. The men were E. E. Brown of East Jordan, for a number of years a dealer in coal and ice in that city. The other offender was Ed Sandell, also a resident of East Jordan.

In the boat were found between 80 and 100 pounds of trout, ranging in size from live inches in length to eight pounds in weight. They had been operating between the Webster and Monroe bridges, and from all reports were old offenders.

Monday they were taken before Justice DaVoll of Boyne Falls and Sandell received a fine of $22 and costs, while Brown was forced to fork over $52 and costs for his fun.

The jack light and three spears were confiscated and the fish will be turned over to some charitable institution.

"Illegal fishing on the many trout streams of this county has got to be stopped," says Game Warden Pearson. Strict watch is being kept and when apprehended in the act of spearing, or persons having under sized trout in their possession, they will be prosecuted to the fullest extent of the law.

Orders Pere Marquette Sold.

U. S. Judge Tuttle, at a meeting of bond holders in federal court at Detroit, Monday, ordered the sale of the Pere Marquette railroad at an upset price of approximately $40,000,000. The court decided that enough should be realized from the sale to pay the debts of the court as guardian of the road since its failure, which amount to $10,000,000, and also held that the claims of the underlying bondholders, $28,000,000 should be met. The date of sale has been fixed as Oct. 1, 1915.

Shed For Machinery.

When done with the farm machinery put it in the shed after thoroughly oiling and the application of paint to the wooden parts if needed. The weak points in many farms is the lack of sufficient room for tools or implements. It will pay any farmer to have a special building in which to keep his implements, machines, wagons, sleds, etc., which not to use. It need not be an expensive one.

Mrs. J. E. Matthews Now in Hospital in Petoskey From Injuries Sustained.

Word received from Bellaire states that Mrs. J. E. Matthews, a former resident of Charlevoix, had received serious injuries from a fall from a step ladder and been taken to Petoskey for treatment.

Later details of the accident state that last Wednesday morning, while Mrs. Matthews was at work in the garden at her home in Bellaire, fixing a trellis for vines, she fell from the ladder, and sustained a commuted fracture of the left shoulder, and also broke her left forearm.

She was taken to Petoskey on the afternoon train of the same day, where she is now being taken care of. The accident is a serious one and it will be some time before she will be able to be around again.

During a Republican campaign speech an orator became quite exasperated at the remarks of an old farmer, who kept insisting as he interrupted the speaker that he was a Democrat. "And why, sir, are you a Democrat, may I ask?" thundered the orator. "My father was a Democrat, as was his father before him," replied the farmer. "Well, now," asked the orator, "suppose your father was a fool and your grandfather was a fool, what, under your line of argument, would you be?" "I'd be a Republican," drawled the farmer.

It happened in front of the village postoffice. An old farmer was holding his frightened team while an automobile rushed by. "Queer how horses are skereed of them things," said one of the loafers. "Queer?" grumbled the farmer. "What would you do if you should see my pants coming down the street with nothing in them?"

Bridget Maloney had been a witness in a lawsuit and had just returned home from the court. "What did the lawyer say to you, Bridget?" inquired her mistress. "Sure, the old boy then axed me did Oi know there was brass enough in me face to make a good sized kettle, an Oi told him there was sauce enough in his tongue to fill it."

Lord Bryce Describes Holy Land's Appeal to Man.

NO OTHER SPOT SO SACRED

Former British Ambassador Writes to National Geographic Society at Washington Interesting Notes on Little Country That Basks So Large in the Hearts and Minds of All Men.

The demand for the complete neutralization of the Holy Land and its development as a shrine and museum for mankind lends deep interest to observations recently prepared by Viscount Bryce, former British ambassador to the United States, for the National Geographic Society.

"Though the traveler's handbooks prepare him to find it small, Palestine surprises him by being smaller than he expected," writes Lord Bryce. "Taking it as the region between the Mediterranean on the west and the Jordan and the Dead sea on the east, from the spurs of Lebanon and Hermon on the north to the desert at Beer-sheva on the south, it is only 119 miles long and from fifty to sixty broad—that is to say, it is smaller than New Jersey, whose area is 7,500 square miles.

"Of this region large parts did not really belong to Israel. Israel had, in fact, little more than the hill country, which lay between the Jordan on the east and the maritime plain on the west. King David in the days of his power looked down from the hill cities of Benjamin, just north of Jerusalem, upon Philistine encampments only twenty-five miles off on the one side and looked across the Jordan to Mount Libanus about as far off on the other.

Small as Connecticut.

"Nearly all the events in the history of Israel that are recorded in the Old Testament happened within a territory no bigger than the state of Connecticut, whose area is 4,800 square miles, and here hardly any other country has there been crowded from the days of Abraham till our own time so much history—that is to say, so many events that have been recorded and deserve to be recorded in the annals of man kind.

"Palestine is a country poor in any natural resources. There are practically no minerals, no coal, no iron, no copper, no silver, though recently some oil wells have been discovered in the Jordan valley. Neither are there any large forests, and though the land may have been better wooded in the days of Joshua than it is now, there is little reason to think that the woods were of trees sufficiently large to constitute a source of wealth. A comparatively small area is fit for tillage.

"Such wealth as the country has consists in its pastures, and the expression 'a land flowing in milk and honey' appropriately describes the best it has to offer, for sheep and goats can thrive on the thin herbage that covers the hills, and the numerous aromatic plants furnish plenty of excellent food for bees. But it is nearly all thin pasture, for the land is dry and the soil mostly shallow. The sheep and goats vastly outnumber the oxen.

Hallowed by Tradition.
"The scenery of the Holy Land, taken as a whole for there are exceptions, is inferior, both in form and in color, to that of northern and middle Italy, to that of Norway and Scotland, to that of the coasts of Asia Minor, to that of many parts of California and Washington.

"If Palestine is not a land of natural wealth nor a land of natural beauty, what is it? What are the impressions which the traveler who tries to see it exactly as it is carries away with him? Roughly summed up, they are these: Stones, caves, tombs, ruins, battlefields, sites hallowed by traditions—all batted in an atmosphere of legend and marvel. In no other country are there so many shrines of ancient worship, so many spots held sacred—some sacred to Jews, some to Christians, some to Mussulmans. Neither has any other country spots that still draw a multitude of pilgrims—not even Belgium and Lombardy, such a profusion of battlefields.

"From the moment that the traveler steps ashore at Jaffa, where he is shown the fishbed rock in which Ananias was chained when Perseus rescued her from the sea monster, and the ruins of the great city that disgorged the Prophet Jonah, until he leaves some Palestine port for home, he is in a wonderful bewildering atmosphere which is steeped in legend and marvel. He wanders in the valley over which the sun and moon stand still at the command of Joshua, and thence every step of his wanderings lends him ever deeper into the maze of remarkable ancient history and tradition, religious association, and an environment of myriad unusual mystic tone of centuries of accretion."

BY THE PASTOR

Many men are liberal constructionists on things religious. While I am a strict constructionist (as all Baptists are), yet I admire a man who is genuine, even though he be a liberalist. But the self-styled, broad-minded fellow who is broad and liberal only when everything goes his way, soon "runs through" with a thinking people. If you disagree with some people religiously or politically, they have no use for you and count you their enemy. A man who is so small as that is no man at all. Some of my best friends differ greatly with me on things religious, but that does not affect our friendship. I am not a Catholic or a Methodist,—no, far from them, and would do my best to make Baptists out of them. I could do no more or less and be consistent. If I am right they are wrong, and if am sincere, I will endeavor to lead my friends aright on all things. I believe in a man being genuine; if not, to me, he is no man—not dig dirt behind the cover to carry out his ends.

The G. A. R. and W. R. C. service Sunday morning was well attended. All churches of the city were invited. Bro. Taggart of the Congregational church, together with his people attended, and assisted in the service. Many others were present. Come again, friends, you are always welcome.

A good service at Burgess' last Sunday. Folks are awakening out there and God will do great things for them. Several of the choir went out with us in one of Mr. Brown's fine autos.

Next Sunday we speak at Marion on "Born Again." Let's have a good crowd, as we will furnish you some special music in connection with this, "The First Promise of Christianity."

Don't fail to attend the parlor musical at the Milner home Friday evening. This promises to be one of the best evenings yet.

room where the United States was, warning of the approach of a storm, following this with a code description.

Bruce came aboard flapping, a catch under each arm. Reddick was nowhere to be seen.

"Keep away from him," warned Hunt. "If you see him in the smoke room, keep out. We'll play the same game we played coming over. But I'll hang him up to dry when he sets foot in little old New York."

Bruce was searched thoroughly enough, but not a stone as big as a plumb came to light. Hunt went home, thoroughly disgusted with the whole adventure.

Now, meanwhile—in fact, the day after Hunt and Hunt sailed for South Africa—Storm and Zudora entered a jeweler's shop and found Mme. Du Val making some purchases.

"Take a ride with me," she invited. Storm shook his head decidedly, but today Zudora was a bit willful. She considered herself a match for any one woman, and perhaps she was.

"I shall be delighted to go," replied Zudora.

Storm accompanied them to the auto-housed curty and took himself off Zudora a Prisoner.

And immediately Zudora regretted her impulse. But she was too plucky to admit this fact to Mme. Du Val. Later she remembered Hunt's explicit warning to stay at home. Mme. Du Val declared that she was first bound to the customs office, as she had been notified of the receipt of a package of Italian lace. After this duty was over they would ride out to the Bronx. At the customs office she merely called up three men she could trust to meet her at a certain spot. Zudora was with her, and they would know what to do.

There had been a series of automobile holdups about this time, so when the three men sprang out from an alleyway and overpowered the chauffeur Zudora was quite innocent as far as suspecting the truth. Mme. Du Val struggled valiantly, but she, too, was bound and gagged. The men started the car at once and headed for one of the nondescript docks along the water front. Here the two women were committed on the path of death to a light from the automobile and step into the motorboat that was waiting in the ship.

Melting waves and wind, after a few minutes, the boat was out on the open water. Zudora, on the contrary, uttered not a sound. She read these words tolerably well. There was no particle of mercy in any one of them. Where were they taking them? What were they going to do with them? Down the river sped the high power boat, across the bay toward the Jersey coast. An island rose up presently, and the man at the wheel set his course for this. Zudora heard a word or two—ransom, fortune. She sat perfectly still. She determined to waste no effort. When the right time came she would make a dash for liberty. She had had some experience in affairs like this, and she had always managed to find a loophole.

When they landed they were bidden to walk on straight ahead into the scrub oaks behind which stood a ramshackle house. The sea encroached on the left with a dozen feet.

A wretched old woman greeted them. "Oh, the dearies!" she cried. "Come right in! Come right in! Fine clothes you look! Here, you, step faster!" she suddenly called at Mme. Du Val, whom she caught roughly by the arm. "The her up, mother, while I take care of this one," said one of the abductors, pushing Zudora on ahead of him.

"Till the her up, never you mind," the hag sent back, and under Zudora's eyes Mme. Du Val was made fast to the wall. "The two of 'em are worth ten thousand if a cent, an' you men see that you get it!"

Mme. Du Val was a good actress, and at no time did she overdo her part. The moment Zudora was secured in the rear room, the window of which overlooked the arm of the sea, she let out a shrill scream as if some one was torturing her. The scream ended in bitter sobs. Presently Zudora heard nothing more. The reason for this was that Madame had returned to the boat and was on the way back to the city.

Then John Storm began his long and weary search. He had a dozen detectives shadowing Mme. Du Val and all those who entered her villa. When confronted by Storm she laughingly declared that Zudora had left her at the park. She was terribly sorry, but beyond that she knew absolutely nothing and thought it was rather strange that John Storm should come to her for information.

On the fifth day of her imprisonment Zudora found a bit of lead pencil, which she hid. She was now free to wander about the room. Even if she got out there was no way of leaving the island. On the sixth day she managed to find a newspaper. She tore off a strip of margin and wrote: "The binder will notify John Storm. At ten o'clock, that Zudora is held prisoner for ransom on Craig Island."

On the seventh day she found an empty beer bottle with a patent cork. She stuffed her message into this and cast it out of the window into the sea at high tide. She had little hope, however, of its going far. The next day might see the bottle stranded on the beach.

Eight weeks after a fisherman in open water picked up the bottle. A stiff land breeze had blown it out into deep water. The fisherman received for this message a sum that exceeded a year's work.

At once Storm set out for Craig Island, and was to those he found there. This time some one should pay and pay well.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

A Lightning Change.
The late Lord Salisbury, says Count Paul Vassili in his book, "Behind the Veil in the Russian Court," shared with the rest of his family the defect of being careless in his dress and general appearance. Lord Odo Russell, who long represented England at Berlin, told Count Vassili this anecdote in illustration of that characteristic.

"One evening," says the count, "Lord Odo and I were chatting about Lord Salisbury's attitude toward his personal appearance, and Lord Odo laughingly mentioned to me his surprise when one day after the dinner bell the embassy had been rung he found Lord Salisbury, who was living there, still busy at work in his study."

"He rushed out," said the ambassador, "and before I had time to put aside the papers on the table, literally in three minutes, was back again ready for dinner. Now in that time he could not even have washed his hands, yet there he was in evening clothes! I could not help asking him how he managed to dress so quickly."

"Oh, my dear 'Blue Bird'!" he said, "my own dear children, I do not know, but I had black trousers ready to go!"

First Memorial Day

It Was Observed In May, 1865, In Charleston, S. C.

A DESCRIPTION OF THE FIRST

Memorial day was found among the reminiscences of the founder of the day, Mrs. Mary Cotton Bedpath, who died in 1911 at her home in Malden, Mass., at the age of ninety. Mrs. Redpath was in Charleston, S. C., at the time with her husband, who was on General Sherman's staff. She was troubled by the lack of attention given to the death of Union soldiers.

"Our men," she wrote, "had been buried as they died from exposure or disease in the very trenches they had burrowed for themselves in the ground as protection against the weather. The majority of these graves were unmarked and the dead was unheeded. My husband and myself and our friends formed a committee for consideration of the matter, and a memorial addressed to the loyal people of South Carolina was issued, calling upon every one in the state to aid in the erection of a monument and a suitable fence to protect it and to surround the place for burial. Response was promptly and generously made by freedmen and others, and in May, 1865, a great memorial service was held in Zion's church."

"At its close, escorted by a detachment of the regiment which under General Hatch occupied the Citadel of Charleston and accompanied by a handful of whites and a large host of negroes, we proceeded to the race course. On the previous day the colored people had gathered great quantities of spring flowers, which they carried to decorate the graves. Mr. Redpath and I rode in an open carriage with General Hatch and another member of the committee. The enthusiasm was intense. When the procession formed freedmen removed the horses from the carriage and dragged it out to the cemetery. The people surged around us, waving their flowers and chanting the words, stirring songs of their race. When we reached the burial ground the graves of the soldiers were heaped with myrtle, the small yellow rose called cloth of gold and other southern blossoms. Our return was made at night, by moonlight, under avenues of cypress trees hung with gray moss, the negroes as they marched still singing their joyously and so strangely exciting hymns."

Mrs. Redpath was closely connected with the civil war, and her home in Malden was one of the northern stations of the "underground railway" by which slaves were sent to Canada and freedom.

THE DAY OF MEMORY.

Bring the flowers, fair and sweet;
Follow close the marching feet
Of the veterans who go,
With their loyal hearts aglow
With the love of men for men,
To their comrades' grave again.

Bring the blossoms, sweet and fair;
Lay them down with love and care
Where the little banners wave
O'er each soldier's sacred grave;
With a word of grace and prayer
For the hero buried there.

Listen while the chaplain reads
Office for the dead and deeds
Are recounted once again
Of the war stormed hill and plain;
Listen while is called the roll—
Death has taken heavy toll.

Bring the little ones to see
And the veterans who go;
Dirge and volley, prayer and speech,
Deep into their hearts will reach;
They the rites must carry on
When the veterans all are gone.
—Emma A. Lente in Farm Journal.

A BATTLEFIELD LETTER.

Written by Dying Union Soldier to Family After Antietam.

An interesting reminder of the civil war is the letter of Captain Allen H. Zacharias, written on the Antietam battlefield. His regiment, the Seventh Michigan, had been driven back when the Union soldiers advanced over the same ground. Captain Zacharias was found holding a paper on which he had written:

Dear Parents, Brothers and Sisters:
I am wounded, mortally, I think.
The fight rages around me.
I have done my duty; this is my consolation.
I hope to meet you all again.
I left not the blue but all fallen and the colors gone.
I am getting weak. My arms are free, but below the chest all is numb.
The enemy's tramping over me.
The numbness up to my heart. Goodbye, all.
ALLEN.

The Return of the Southern Flags.
When it was first proposed to return to the southern states the Confederate flags which had been captured in the battles of the civil war the proposition met with a storm of protest. In 1905 the flags were returned, Massachusetts being the first to not, though it had been loudest in denunciation when the proposal was advocated by Sumner.

In the following year the command in chief of the U. S. A., James T. Sherman, asked in his Memorial day order that the graves of the soldiers of both armies should be decorated without discrimination, saying, "The old flag has been reburied since 1865, with the blood of the north and the south alike, and the sun of state is so lately abroad for all things."

CUT OUT HIS RIBS TO SEW UP HEART

Surgeons' Most Darling Operation Proves Successful.

LUNG COLLAPSE PREVENTED

Patient Is Kept Alive by Electrical Machine, Which Pumps Through Throat Mixture of Air and Ether While Chest Is Opened and Silk Stitches Are Put in Deep Wound.

A remarkable operation, involving the sewing up of a wound in a man's heart, has just been performed successfully at the Beth Israel hospital, New York city.

The injured man, Israel Ziff, runs a pushcart near the hospital, selling slices of coconut to passersby. He is in the habit of selling the coconut himself with a knife more than a foot long, whose wide blade tapers down to a sharp point.

Several months ago Ziff, who is forty-eight years old, cut himself badly while cutting up his wares, and his wife and children begged him to give up his occupation and find some other method of earning a living. He tried to do it, but he could find nothing else. His pushcart was well known in the neighborhood, and his business was good, so he continued at it.

Illness was his on a recent night, and the doctors were going fast. Every few minutes found Ziff bounding over with his knife at work. Presently the thing he had always feared happened—the knife slipped and cut through his left breast, a deep wound.

Pluckily Walks to Hospital.
Ziff knew he was badly hurt, so he straightened up, laid down his knife and started for the Beth Israel hospital, about a block and a half away. How he got there is a mystery to the surgeons, but he did get there. He walked into the office looking as if nothing much was the matter.

Dr. George Levy, who received him, saw that his injuries were serious and notified Dr. Alfred A. Schwartz, the house surgeon. Dr. Schwartz's examination disclosed a wound at least an inch and a half long at the outer surface and going far down in.

Dr. Schwartz called up Dr. Charles Goodman, the attending surgeon, and told him that he was badly needed at once. Dr. Simon D. Ehrlich, the hospital's anesthetist, also was notified, and Ziff was carried to the operating room. Here Dr. Schwartz packed the wound with gauze and stopped the flow of blood, and everything was made ready to shut work when Dr. Goodman arrived.

The operating surgeon arrived in record time, and then began some quick work. The flow of blood had to be stopped in the first place and the patient anaesthetized for the operation. But if the chest were cut open to check the hemorrhage the lungs would have collapsed from the air pressure on the outside, so air had to be pumped in until the inflation was sufficient to resist the pressure from without.

This process was combined with the application of the anaesthetic by the method known as intratracheal anaesthesia. By means of an apparatus operated by electricity, ether was mixed in a jar with air in the proportion considered advisable, and the resultant mixture forced through a tube far down into the patient's throat. By this means anaesthesia was produced and the air within the lungs was raised to double the normal pressure.

Electrical Pump Used.
The electrical machine used is so designed that it mixes ether with air in the proper proportions, and supplies it in little gasps through a tube passing through the throat into the lungs. Just as if the lungs had taken it in by normal functioning.

With the patient anaesthetized and the lungs secured against danger of collapse, Dr. Goodman laid open the chest. The incision was ten inches long. The surgeon cut away three ribs and a piece of the breastbone. He found the chest full of blood, and this had to be drawn off before anything more could be done. When the blood was cleared away Dr. Goodman found that the knife had made a bit cut in the pericardium and that the point had gone down nearly three-eighths of an inch into the heart.

The most ticklish part of the operation followed: sewing up the heart while it was pulsating. One stitch was sufficient to close the wound in the heart itself, three more did the work with the pericardium. Dr. Goodman sewed the skin together over the wound, and Ziff was put away to recover. He came out of the operation as rapidly as could have been expected, and except that the protection of the ribs over the heart will be missing, he is likely to be in no way the worse for his experience. He will leave the hospital in a few days.

Had the point of the knife gone a millimeter or so farther in Ziff never would have lived to get to the hospital, as the consequent hemorrhage would have been almost instantly fatal. The hospital authorities at first supposed from the nature and depth of the wound that he had been stabbed in a fight, and it was not until a day or two later that Ziff recovered sufficiently to tell them how he had been injured.

Keep in touch with what is going on. Read the Courier; that's the best way.

THE WORD HELL.

A Little Book That Contains Some Startling Information.

A little book selling at only five cents, postpaid, is having a very wide circulation up into the millions. It contains some very startling information respecting the meaning of the word Hell. It claims to demonstrate, both from the Hebrew and the Greek of our Bible, that Hell is not a place of eternal torment, but merely another name for the Tomb, the Grave, the State of Death. It affects to show that man was not redeemed from a far-off place of eternal torture, but quotes the Scriptures proving that he was redeemed from the Grave at the cost of his Redeemer's life and that the Scriptural Hope, both for the Church and the World, is a resurrection hope based upon the death and resurrection of Jesus. The book is certainly worth the reading. The information it furnishes is certainly valuable, far beyond its trifling cost. Order it at once from the Bible and Tract Society, 11 Hicks Street Brooklyn N. Y.

Temperance

(Conducted by the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union.)

A RECENT CONVERT.

The announcement of his conversion to prohibition was made at exercises at the Franklin union in Boston by ex-Governor Foss, who has been three times elected chief executive of the state of Massachusetts.

"I have been thinking that it's about time for me to stop voting for the licensed saloon," said Mr. Foss. "So long as I make it a rule to have my superintendents and foremen discharge men who are addicted to liquor, how inconsistent it is for me to support an open saloon near my manufacturing establishment, where the men have to go back and forth two or three times a day."

"This question of prohibition is a very large one. It may be the most important social, political and moral question of today. Certainly it is an economic question. From an economic viewpoint, why shouldn't we have national prohibition?"

"Abraham Lincoln said: 'You can't have a nation half slave and half free.' We can't have a nation half wet and half dry. It is impossible perfectly to enforce prohibition in a state surrounded by liquor states."

"I believe national prohibition is in the interest of public health. In my three years as governor of Massachusetts I saw 20,000 or more people locked up in this state and $5,000,000 a year appropriated for their support. They were there on account of liquor, mainly. It is ridiculous to stand to the way of this movement. The large cities get a comparatively small fund from licenses. Aside from every other consideration, economically, we here in America must come to national prohibition."

PANAMA-PACIFIC EXHIBIT.

The per capita consumption of alcoholic liquor in non-prohibition Wisconsin and prohibition Kansas is shown at the exhibit of the National Woman's Christian Temperance union at the Panama-Pacific exposition. A hoghead having a sixty-four galloo capacity represents the amount of liquor consumed per capita in Wisconsin, and a troy keg represents the amount used in Kansas.

The large bronze Japanese hell in this exhibit reminds one of the thousands of men who, giving up the habit of smoking, contributed their pipes to make this hell to commemorate the work of Mary Allen West, a W. C. T. U. missionary to Japan.

The boys are interested in "Properly Statistics," showing, for instance, that there are twenty automobiles to every one hundred farmers in dry Kansas, while there is only one to every one hundred farmers in wet Missouri.

The famous Polyglot petition, containing 7,000,000 signatures, which was originated by Frances E. Willard and has been presented to several countries, is of historic value.

NORTH DAKOTA DEVELOPMENT.

Many interesting facts are being brought out concerning the states that have been under prohibitory laws for some years, that they may help and encourage other states that are now meeting the wet or dry issue and that will at coming elections have the question to decide. The 1910 census shows that prosperous development along all lines in North Dakota is starting.

Not only did the population increase 80 per cent in the decade from 1900 to 1910, but her wealth increased 281.9 per cent, or from $225,166,751 in 1900 to $76,814,205 in 1910; the value of farm products increased 211 per cent, or from $64,252,000 in 1900 to $220,000,000 in 1910. Its live stock increased in value in the same period 155 per cent, probably a larger increase than any other state. The crops increased 234.4 per cent, or from $53,911,419 in 1900 to $180,279,872 in 1910, a percentage exceeded by no other state. North Dakota's agricultural wealth is greater than that of the seven combined New England states. Her bank deposits from 1898 to 1913 increased by more than 1,000 per cent.

THE BETTER RISK.

"How the use of alcohol shortens life" was one of the interesting features of the discussion recently before the Association of Life Insurance Presidents at the Hotel Astor, New York. Mr. Arthur Hunter, chairman of a committee which studied the cases of 2,000,000 policy-holders in an investigation for 43 life insurance companies into the causes of premature deaths, said that alcohol played a leading role in hastening death.

On the other hand, the Equity Life Assurance company has passed through three of its eleven years without the loss of a single life of a total abstainer, although nine-tenths of its insured lives are total abstainers.

CLEANS THEM OUT.

"Alcohol," it is said, "will remove stains from summer clothes." That is true, but it also removes the summer clothes, the spring, the autumn and the winter clothes, not only from the one who drinks it, but from the wife and family as well. It removes the household furniture, the eatables from the pantry, the smiles from the face of the wife, the laugh from the innocent lips of his children and the happiness out of his home. As a remover of things alcohol has no equal.

THE OLD WAR DRUM AWAKES

Copyright, 1915, by American Press Association.

It is standing in the corner of the littered lumber room. And the dust upon its rawhide head is pleading for a broom. But the old war drum is silent now; it has no voice to call. Like a dry, decrepit veteran it leans against the wall.

But hush, hush, hush!
Don't you hear the war drum beat?
Don't you hear its rumble-rumble-rumble-rum?
Lean and listen! To your ear
Put your hand, and you may hear,
Faint and far, the rumble-rumble of the drum!

But a ghostly ancient Echo is the war drum's warning low. From the faroff fields of carnage, from the battles long ago. From the gory Shiloh maelstrom, from the Chickamauga hell, From the fierce Antietam cauldron, where the flower of manhood fell.

Ah, hear, hear, hear!
Can't you feel the war drum throb?
Can't you sense its rumble-rumble-rumble-rum?
For the moment close your eyes.
It is not a mere surmise
Tis the real rumble-rumble of the drum!

They have borne it in the morning when the bugles blew the notes. Rousing regiments to marshal and assault the cannon throats. And the drum has mixed its rumbling with the bugle and the fire. Calling men to make for fatherland the sacrifice of life.

Oh, list, list, list!
Don't you know the war drum's voice?
Can't you catch its rumble-rumble-rumble-rum?
Stand a little space aside.
Let the drummer beat with pride
Louder now the rumble-rumble of the drum!

Yes, we hear its solemn rumbling as it leads the charging lines In the Wilderness, at Resaca, at Fair Oaks, Seven Pines; Hear its deep basso profundo as it halts upon the height Peerless Pickett's launching legions in the fury of the fight.

Yes, hark, hark, hark!
Tis the war drum's tongue awake!
Hear it voice the rumble-rumble-rumble-rum!
Doff your hat and heave a cheer!
Why, the drummer's here—he's here,
Beating out the rumble-rumble of the drum!

Thus I saw the ghostly drummer on a morn in latter May When beyond the littered lumber room a band began to play. And I turned me for a moment for a glance along the street Where a thin blue line of veterans went by on weary feet.

"Ah, hush, hush, hush!"
Called the monitor within.
"Hush and hear the rumble-rumble-rumble-rum!"
Was the war drum come awake,
Or my heartbeats—did they make
All the mighty rumble-rumble of the drum?

Bits of Sentiment For Memorial Day

A VETERAN of the war is dearer and more precious than the flag. He is a living flag, star and stripe, and a living memory. Let the national flag that over every schoolhouse in the country and the exercises he such as shall impress upon our youth the patriotic duties of American citizens.—Benjamin Harrison.

Death never comes too soon, if necessary, in defense of the liberties of our country.—Story.

I only regret that I have but one life to give for my country.—Nathan Hale.

The nation's debt of honor is about the resting place of her soldier dead.—Green.

"JUST FOR MEMORIES."

Nation Pauses on Memorial Day to Think of Dead and Living Heroes.

"Five minutes for memories" on Memorial day is observed more and more generally in the United States, especially by the members of the G. A. R. and similar organizations throughout the entire country. For five minutes those who love the memories of the men who fought for their country stand unmoved and pay tribute.

As the custom has been for several years, when the tribute to the dead was paid, so will it be this year. All the flags on public and army private buildings will be lowered to half mast, bells will toll each thirty seconds during this time, and those who love the memories of the men who died for the Union will be saved with us in the past, stand unmoved.

A special order of the commander in chief of the Grand Army of the Republic, issued in connection with this custom, reads thus:

At 12 o'clock on Memorial day the flag will be lowered to half mast and remain at that position until 1 o'clock.

minutes all comrades will stand uncovered as a mark of respect to the memories of those who have died.

"This hotel is under a new management."

"Why, I still see the old proprietor around."

"Yes, but he got married last week."

A Lich Gate.

A lich gate is a shed, generally of oak, over the entrance of a churchyard. Beneath which the hearers paused when bringing a body for interment. There the clergyman met the body and read the introductory part of the burial service as he proceeded the funeral train into the church. Lich gates of old lich gates are still to be seen in many country churchyards. In Wales they are more modern and are usually built of stone. Some of the old lich gates are formed with one wide door opening on a central pivot and self-closing by means of a rope pulley wheel in the roof and a stone which is fixed in an iron frame, a primitive but effective piece of mechanism. In Herefordshire they are also called "scullage" or "scullage" gates. "Lich gate" is derived from the Anglo-Saxon lich, a corpse; hence the north country "lyke walk."—London Answers.

The Broom at the Masthead.

There still exists a very old custom among seamen of displaying a broom at the masthead of ships intended to be sold to indicate that they are to be "swiped away." The custom originated with the famous Dutch admiral Tromp, who, when he appeared off the English coast, showed a broom to show his intention of sweeping the English fleet from the sea. The English admiral, in response to this, ordered a broom to be hoisted on his ship, and the English fleet was not destroyed. For this reason the broom is still hoisted at the masthead of ships intended to be sold.

TRAVELING SALESMEN TO VOTE ON SUFFRAGE.

New York Men Aid Women and Association Will Be Polls.

In their work for suffrage New York women have the interest and to a large extent the support of the Associated Commercial Travelers of America, according to Marc M. Reynolds, secretary of the organization. This Mr. Reynolds says, is due to the fact that traveling men are working for their own right to vote and so are especially able to sympathize with the demands of the women.

"We are trying to have special provisions made so that the traveling man may vote though absent from home," explained Mr. Reynolds. "In five states of the Union such provision has been made, and we are now determined to get the same right for the men of New York."

Because of the analogy in their position the question of woman suffrage came up at the last meeting of the Associated Commercial Travelers of America. A lively discussion resulted in a vote to poll the organization. Each of the 3,500 members is to receive a letter asking him to state his position in regard to woman suffrage. The result of this poll will be announced at the semiannual meeting in August.

"I feel confident," said Mr. Reynolds, "that the organization will go on record as endorsing woman suffrage."

There are no women members among the Associated Commercial Travelers, although it is estimated that there are about 5,000 women commercial travelers in the country. Whether women shall or shall not be admitted to membership is a much debated question in the organization.

"In certain lines women are better than men in our field," Mr. Reynolds admitted. "The women are doing good work and have come to stay in the business. We might as well make up our minds to that. In the same way I believe the time has come when women should have a part in our national life, and I think they are bound to get it."

Let Your Wife Be Bartender

To the married man who cannot get along without his drinks the following is being suggested as a means of freedom from bondage of the saloons:

Start a saloon in your own house. Be the only customer. You will have no license to pay. Go to your wife and give her $2 to buy a gallon of whiskey, and remember there are 69 drinks in one gallon.

Buy your drinks from no one but your wife, and by the time the first gallon is gone, she will have $8 to put in the bank and $2 to start business again.

Should you live ten years and continue to buy booze from her and then die with snakes in your boots, she will have money enough to bury you decently, educate your children, buy a house and lot, marry a "decent" man and quit thinking about you.

Garfield's Memorial Address.

On the first formal Memorial day, in 1898, the services at Arlington cemetery were perhaps the most impressive. The speaker on that occasion was General James A. Garfield, who said:

"I love to believe that no heroic sacrifice is ever lost; that the characters of men are molded and inspired by what their fathers have done; that treasured up in American souls are all the unconscious influences of the great deeds of the Anglo-Saxon race from Aghacourt to Bunker Hill. Each for himself gathered up the cherished purposes of life—its aims and ambitions. Its dearest affections—and flung all, with life itself, into the scale of battle. If each grave had a voice to tell us what its silent tenant last saw and heard on earth we might stand with uncovered heads and hear the whole story of the war. We should hear that one perished when the first great drops of the crimson shower began to fall, when the darkness of that first disaster at Manassas fell like an eclipse on the nation; that another died of disease while warily waiting for winter to end; that this one fell on the field when the tide of war shook the dome of yonder capital and reached in the chambers of the executive mansion. The voices of these dead will forever fill the land like holy benedictions. What other spot so fitting for their last resting place as this, under the shadow of the capital saved by their valor? Here where the grim edge of battle joined, here where all the hope and fear and agony of their country centered, here let them rest, asleep on the nation's heart, entombed in the nation's love!"

Nature's Own Decoration Day.

It is not easy to write about the dreadful war between the north and the south. We press our breasts against a thorn when we do. It is often said that it is still too early to write the true story of our civil war. It will soon be too late. We should not shrink from recording what we know to be true. "Thus only will a full history of American courage and fidelity be preserved, for all were Americans. The last time I visited Petersburg I drove out to her battlefields. Nature had hidden the scars with beauty. The seeds of the field daisy had been scattered wherever the Federal forces had been encamped, and they had whitened the fields and covered the graves by the wayside. Nature had not forgotten these lonely, unmarked graves.—Mrs. Roger A. Pryor.

Memorial Day's Meaning.

"Was Memorial day set aside for sports, baseball games, work horse parades and other spectacles or was it set aside in commemoration of the boys in blue who fought and died for their country in 1861-65?"

"Let us as patriotic citizens honor the veterans who are still with us and cherish the names of those who have crossed the great divide" says a letter to a Chicago newspaper.

ANNUAL SUMMER CAMP JUNE 22

off during the summer season to go camping with their boys. This association project is more than a camp. It is a purposeful camp. The aim of the committee is to bring the boys together for an outing that will benefit them not only physically, but also morally and mentally.

Parents can rest assured that boys attending this camp will be well cared for as they are at home, if not better, for all of their activities are supervised by adults. When they rise in the morning, behold the adult leaders are there. When they go on a hike, behold, the adult supervisors are in their midst. When they go swimming or boating there will be the adult leaders found watching after them. At the base ball games and the track meets these camp leaders are ever present. And when night comes and campers roll into their blankets, an adult leader will be found in the tent with each six campers.

Swimming, boating, and fishing at Pinchurst Point are good, and Horton's creek is nearby for trout. A large, bubbling spring furnishes plenty of good water for the camp. Parents wishing further information regarding the camp can call Mr. Ball by phone, and he will be glad to furnish any information they may desire. The usual camp fee of $5 will be charged all campers and $1 of this amount is to be paid at the time of enrollment. All enrollments must be in the hands of the secretary on or before June 12, and it will be a great help to the camp management if they are handed in just as early as possible.

We have the Automobile Tires with 4,000 and 5,000 miles adjustment.

HARBOR SPRINGS WON TRACK MEET

Petoskey in Second Place While Charlevoix is at Bottom of List.

Shapton the Only Man on Home Team Who Got a Place in Any Event.

The youngsters under the cognomen of Mr. Wilson and Mr. Herrick, hailing from Harbor Springs, were directly responsible for winning the Northern Michigan Track Meet at the Fair Grounds, Petoskey, last Saturday afternoon. These two men composed the track team sent over by Harbor and in every event entered they were able to cop a place and most of the time it was in the first rank. Wilson scored twenty-four points on four firsts, a second and a third, and Herrick finished the rest of the final thirty-eight with two firsts, a second and a third. The final score of the meet was Harbor Springs 38, Petoskey 28, Traverse City 16, Cheboygan 10, Boyne City 9, Pellston 6, Charlevoix 4.

The local high school team was completely snuffed out in every event entered. It was clearly seen that the local boys were not in the class represented by the other schools. In all probability Charlevoix might have placed in the high jump had not Kirby made a mistake in the time of the event. Kirby has been flitting with 5 feet 2 inches the past week and local coaches were relying on him to make our only points. As it was Shapton held out and fell on 5 feet 2 inches, tying for fourth place and registering the only count made in the meet.

The one big surprise of the day was the discus event. Petoskey threw it into space for 113 feet 6 inches, completely shattering the previous record and establishing one that will take many years to pass. Atkin probably will live to have a family before his record is smashed.

In the dashes, while the time was exceptionally good, there was no time made that showed any coming among the athletes. The only man who may cause a little stir in faster circles was Wilson of Harbor Springs.

It was the consensus of opinion that the track meet this year was the most auspicious of any. The number of schools entered, the work of the men and the general friendly and co-operative atmosphere that pervaded, the spectators and all who had a part in the meet all pointed to this fact. On the Illinois that carried Traverse City, Boyne City, East Jordan and Charlevoix athletes and spectators, all was real true high school spirit. At Petoskey the town turned out to greet the teams with a rousing enthusiasm seldom witnessed in this part of the state. It was altogether a success.

Summary of events—High Jump, Lee, Petoskey, first; Herrick, Harbor Springs, second; Shapton, Charlevoix; Coddington, Traverse City; Swander, Petoskey; McRae, Pellston tied for third. Height 5 feet 3 inches.

120 Yard High Hurdles—Wilson, Harbor Springs, first; Lee, Petoskey, second; Zipp, Petoskey, third. Time, 18:35 seconds.

220 Yard Hurdles—Herrick, Harbor Springs, first; Zipp, Petoskey, second; Wilson, Harbor Springs, third. Time, 29 seconds.

100 Yard Dash—Wilson, Harbor Springs, first; Campbell, Pellston, second; Holliday, Traverse City, third. Time, 10:3.

220 Yrd Dash—Wilson, Harbor Springs, first; Campbell, Pellston, second; Morton, Boyne City, third. Time, 23:1 seconds.

440 Yard Dash—Swander, Petoskey, first; Franklin, Traverse City, second; Hawley, Traverse City, third. Time, 56 seconds.

880 Yard Dash—Conloquoy, Boyne City, first; Harvey, Traverse City, second; Bard, Petoskey, third. Time, 2 minutes 15 seconds.

COMING TO THE FRONT

One Hundred and Fifty Acres Now Under Cultivation on the Nicholls Farm.

Harry Nicholls, of the Charlevoix Lumber Co. is entitled to considerable commendation on the manner in which he has transformed the big tract of land south of the city, known as the old lumber company's camp, into a fine farm.

Until recently this tract of land was nothing but a huge stretch of cut-over land, thickly dotted with stumps, fallen trees and second growth timber. Today some 160 acres are under cultivation, 40 acres being planted to potatoes, another 40 to corn, 20 to oats, 10 to cucumbers, and 90 acres to fine alfalfa.

Four hundred acres are fenced in, upon which 60 head of cattle owned by Mr. Nicholls and 70 head owned by different people are grazing. Among the cattle owned by Mr. Nicholls are some as fine Holsteins as can be found in this section of the state.

It is planned each year to clear up and place a number of acres under cultivation, and if the pace set during the past few years is kept up, the result will be one of the finest pieces of farm land in northern Michigan. Mr. Nicholls has 820 acres in this tract of land, and it is being taken care of by Joe Shores.

JUNE 11 ENDS SCHOOL WORK

C. H. S. Graduates Class of Sixteen This Year.

Prof. S. B. Laird Will Deliver Address at M. E. Church for Commencement Week.

On Friday evening, June 11, the Charlevoix High School will graduate a class of sixteen, not as large a class as last year, but of the general average. The events of the week will open Sunday evening, June 6, at the Methodist church, when the baccalaureate address will be given by Rev. Quinton Walker, to be followed by the class play on Wednesday evening and commencement exercises on the following Friday night.

Instead of the regular class day exercises the class of 1915 will present the play Pygmalion and Galatea, at the Charlevoix theatre, the evening of June 9, commencing at 8 o'clock. Members of the class have been drilling on their parts for the past two weeks with splendid results, and the event is looked forward to with great anticipation. Those who take part are:

Pygmalion—Bernice Bush. Leucippi—Fred Gregory. Chrysoe—Horatia Iddings. Agassimos—Bernice Pulcifer. Mimos—Florence Meggison. Galatea—Ruth Mitchell. Cynisca—Marcia Goss. Daphne—Dorothy Armstrong. WHY DO CHARLEVOIX BOYS AND GIRLS LEAVE SCHOOL?

Is It Due to Lack of Ambition That Twenty-two Students, Mostly Boys, Quit School During Present Term?—Situation is Becoming More Serious Each Year.

A recent investigation discloses the fact that Charlevoix has more boys and girls discontinuing their high school studies than any of the public educational institutions in this county. On an average Boyne City had in the vicinity of 160 in high school, and East Jordan 125 at the opening of the school year. Last September Charlevoix registered 132 in the high school. This year the books will be closed with an enrollment of 110.

One of the most difficult tasks in the educational world is to hold students in school. The freshmen class enters high school in such numbers that there is scarcely standing room and then dwindles down to such a few that there is always ample room on the platform on graduation days. The most natural thing to conclude, and which of course is correct, is that there is something wrong. The question arises, where does the fault lie? Under the present day school system, offering glowing and wonderful opportunities for the student to improve himself, it is absolutely safe and reliable to say that the fault is not in the school. There is only one other conclusion to draw. The fault lies with the student himself.

Why is it the twenty-two students, mostly boys, severed their connection with the local high school this year. Is it because the course of study prescribed by the Board of Education and propounded efficient by the school authorities, is too strenuous? Is it because the scholar is not made to feel, by the interest and encouragement of those at home, that the time spent in the high school are years of the utmost value to future success? Or is it because the boy or girl does not fully appreciate the value of education and is not willing to delve into its mysteries with enthusiasm and interest to give it a trial?

In glancing over the above questions, the two former are quite easily eliminated. The average student is able to meet all requirements of school courses with good results, provided he goes half way, and there are few citizens today who do not value the school in a personal way, as it touches their children, and as a community builder. So it is not necessary to dwell on these points.

A lack of real, true ambition is the only answer that can be given to the third question above. It is not courses, lack of interest on the part of parents, or a dozen other reasons advanced by some wayward students, that causes so many to "quit." Ambition is a minus quantity in their make-up. They come to school for a month, two weeks, a week—look over the situation, come to the conclusion that school has noticeably changed and it is a place to work, a work-shop for the ambitious boy and girl. Then they will vacate.

Ambition is one of the greatest characteristics a scholar can be endowed with. Without it one is no more than a circle with the rim removed—nothing. With it, he has the world before him. Opportunity always comes to the ambitious boy, not because he has a better chance, but because he grasps it with a death-like grip, wrestles with it and conquers it, clearing the way for bigger and better undertakings and successes.

The ambitious boy or girl never stays out, skips and junks about it; thinks there is nothing to it—is satisfied simply with a job. Nothing but a lack of ambition causes the enrollment of a well-managed system to decrease during the year.

It is true that many are forced to leave school because of financial reasons. But did Abe Lincoln let a lack of money smother his ambition to let himself for the law profession. If he had he would have died a rail splitter, unknown. Instead, he reached the highest pinnacle an American citizen can aspire to, the presidency. All because he had ambition and determination. Money never stopped one from gaining an education, provided he is willing to put himself out and deprive himself for the sake of the cause.

The situation in the local schools is one that every citizen should be intensely interested in. The present younger generation is to be at the helm in this community in a few years, and the efficiency of their administration then will rest largely upon their preparation today. A concerted effort on the part of parents will alleviate the annual condition of affairs. It should be made a topic of serious conversation in every home in Charlevoix. There will be no changes for the better until this is carried out.

DEATH OF JOHN ASHMORE

Grim Reaper Again Calls One of Charlevoix's Pioneer Residents.

Death came as a relief to John Z. Ashmore last Thursday at his home on the north side, after suffering for some time from poor health, resulting in a general break down.

Mr. Ashmore came to Charlevoix county in 1883. He was born in New York, July 24, 1853, and was 62 years of age at time of his death. On March 25, 1874, he was united in marriage to Miss Pamela E. Jenkins. To this union four children were given, one son, and three daughters.

He was a member of the Methodist Episcopal church and the K. O. T. M. During his residence in this vicinity Mr. Ashmore has made a great many near friends who will greatly miss him. He was a hard and conscientious working man and was held in high esteem by his large circle of acquaintanceship. He leaves to mourn their loss beside his wife, one son, Robert, and three daughters, Mrs. Aviri Wall and Mrs. Delia Fuller of Flint, and Mrs. Howard Smith of this city.

Funeral services were held from the Methodist church Sunday afternoon at one o'clock, Rev. Quinton Walker, officiating. Interment at Brookside cemetery.

MANY VERDICTS GROUND OUT

May Term of Circuit Court Has Been a Busy One.

Jury Discharged Friday Subject to Call—Four Verdicts Granted.

With Friday afternoon of last week the May term of circuit court finished all jury trials, and the jury was discharged subject to call.

The opening week started with the case of The People vs. William Powell, desertion. Powell was able to convince the judge and jury that he had made necessary preparations to take care of his wife and children, and the case was discharged.

In the case of The People vs. Roy Bayliss, he pleaded guilty, but sentence has not as yet been made.

Francis, Joe and Jonas Shagonaby, three Indians from near Boyne Falls, brought to the county jail just before the opening of court week, were found guilty of the charge of destruction of personal property. The boys have a bad reputation in the vicinity where they live, and on this occasion beat an old, helpless man and broke up the household furniture, etc., in a manner that it looked as if a cyclone had struck it. While they have not yet received their sentence, without a question, they will get several years at Ionia.

Louis Clafin pleaded guilty to the charge of desertion. Clafin left a wife and two small children to support themselves, while he travelled from place to place having a good time. He was given an opportunity to furnish bond, but up to the time we go to press he has failed to do so. It looks very much as if he would get a trip to some state institution.

By direction of the court a verdict of no cause of action was given in the case of George Simmerman vs. the City of Boyne.

The cases of The Big Rapids Savings Bank vs. Boyne City Hotel Co. et al., and Edward Brown vs. George Jepson, were both settled out of court.

Pearl McHale was released from the bonds of matrimony that tied her to Harry McHale, as was also the verdict in the cases of Stella Bayliss vs. Louis Bayliss; Iva J. Lusk vs. Edward Lusk, and Harriet A. Warren vs. Charles A. Warren.

The court is now busy with non-jury cases, and later on the jury may be recalled to try several cases that Judge Mayne is not qualified to preside over.

Moves to Portland.

A letter received from Mr. and Mrs. F. N. Chapel, formerly residents of this city, who located at Grant's Pass, Oregon, states that they have traded their home known as the "Charlevoix Ranch" for a large apartment house in Portland, Oregon, and have moved to that place. Mrs. Chapel states as one of the reasons the trade was made was to give their son, Franklin, the better school facilities afforded by a city the size of Portland. They are both as well satisfied with the west as they were when they located there. Mr. Chapel expects to again engage in the drug business.

CENTRAL GARAGE CHANGES HANDS

Fine Property Bought on Saturday Last by A. L. Hart & Son.

New Owners to Conduct Business Along Same Lines—Have Agency for Two Autos.

Another real estate deal of no small importance was made last Saturday, when A. L. Hart & Son purchased the fine cement automobile garage on Antrim street, known as Central Garage, owned and conducted for the past three years by J. A. Vought.

The building is one of the largest of its kind in this section of the country, and was built especially for a garage. After the main portion of the building was erected, it was found that more floor space was needed, and a large addition was added to the north end of the building. Even with this large amount of floor space, more room is needed during the busy summer months for housing cars.

The new owners took possession on Monday morning. The business will be conducted along the same lines as heretofore. Special attention will be given to the housing and care of autos, and competent mechanics will be engaged to do repair work. Practically everything in automobile necessities will be carried, and nothing overlooked to give the best of care to the enormous business the garage has had in the past.

In addition to the care of the garage, the new owners will conduct an agency for the Monroe and Chevrolet autos. Cars will also be kept for hire.

The former owner, Mr. Vought, will conduct the blacksmith shop in its present location until the first of the year, when the entire building will be used for garage purposes.

A. L. Hart & Son need no introduction to the public, as they have been

HEED THE WARNING

Many Charlevoix People Have Done So.

When the kidneys are weak they give unmistakable warnings that should not be ignored. By examining the urine and treating the kidneys upon the first sign of disorder, many days of suffering may be saved. Weak kidneys usually expel a dark, ill-smelling urine, full of "brickdust" sediment and painful in passage. Sluggish kidneys often cause a dull pain in the small of the back, headaches, dizzy spells, tired, languid feelings and frequent rheumatic twinges.

Doan's Kidney Pills are for the kidneys only. There is no better recommended remedy.

Mrs. R. M. McKeel, 214 Mason street, Charlevoix, says: "I had been troubled for several months by kidney disease. My body bloated quite badly and I had weak back and severe pains in my kidneys. My rest was broken at night. I finally got Doan's Kidney Pills at the Ivy Drug Store and they gave me relief in every way."

Price 50 cents at all dealers. Don't simply ask for a kidney remedy—get Doan's Kidney Pills—the same that Mrs. McKeel had. Foster—Milburn Company, Props., Buffalo, N. Y.

Expert Advice For the Automobile Owner

Queries and Replies Covering Matters of Importance to the Man Who Runs a Car

My car used to make about eighteen miles per gallon of gasoline. This year it is not making over eight. It misses until speed gets up to ten or twelve miles per hour. When the engine becomes heated the spark lever works very badly. What is the cause of this?

Since your car misses only at speeds below twelve miles per hour and then only when warmed up, it seems likely that the heat causes a slight leakage either by warping a valve or by expanding a valve stem. Test the compression when the motor is warm, and if any cylinder is weak see whether it is not due to lack of clearance between valves and push rods or to a warped valve. These defects would cause enough leakage to make the motor miss fire when the throttle is nearly closed, but not enough to make it miss at wider throttle openings.

Faulty carburetion may also be the cause of the misfiring. Reduce the richness of the mixture when running slowly and see if this makes any difference. It is possible that the reduction in charge weight caused by the heating of the air is sufficient to decrease the ratio of air to gasoline enough to prevent combustion, at least when the motor is cold enough, air is taken in so that the motor will run all right.

Another possibility is that there is a leak in the intake manifold due to its warping out of shape when heated. Tighten up bolts holding the manifold, and if necessary put in new gaskets. See that the brakes are not dragging and that the spark advance has not slipped so that you are running with it retarded.

Why are so many manufacturers doing away with radius rods?

The principal reason for discarding the radius rods is simplicity. It is obvious that when the drive is taken directly by the springs the manufacturer has saved on the cost of production and also reduced the number of wearing parts. Many manufacturers believe that the drive can be just as successfully transmitted through the springs as through radius rods, but as both constructions are widely used it is difficult to say which is better.

Is it easier to pump up a tire with the wheel jacked up when the weight of the car is resting on the wheel?

Theoretically it is slightly easier to pump up a tire when the weight is removed, but the difference is so small that it is doubtful whether any ordinary gauge would measure it. The extra work required represents the amount of work to lift the weight on that wheel through the distance that the inflated tire lifts the rim off the ground, this distance being approximately three inches. But this is divided up among so many pump strokes that the extra work is not felt, and it is probably just as economical of energy to do it this way as to jack the wheel up.

What are the specific advantages of six cylinder over four cylinder motors?

The advantage of greatest importance is that the six has a more even torque, or turning effort, than the four, because there are three explosions to each revolution against two per revolution in the four. The average six will throat the lower than a four of the same size.

Kindly inform me how to determine when the front wheels are out of alignment, and how can I straighten them?

The alignment of the front wheels can easily be determined by measurement. With the wheels pointing approximately straight, measure the distance between the two wheels, at the front and rear. They should be one-quarter inch nearer at the front, but not any more. The adjustment is made by shortening or lengthening the tie rod.

Please tell me how to place old shoes over new, and is it a practical thing to do?

To use the old tires do not cut the bead off. You have to take the casing off the wheel and force it into the old casing and then apply both to the wheel at once. Many claim this gives a practically perfect proof tire and one that lasts longer than the single shoe. It is desirable to have good inner tubes on account of its being too much trouble changing in case an old tube gives way. So far as heat and sand are concerned, many claim they do not seem to amount to anything, though others declare they render the idea impractical. The old casing is supposed to fit so tightly over the good one that there is no slippage, and it protects the good tire from road heat. Some drivers, however, cut slits in old casings around the whole tread from end to end. They say it makes them easier to apply as well as to allow ventilation. These slits are cut about every four inches and about one-half inch of the material taken out. Authorities disagree on the practicality of the scheme of using old shoes in this way, but individual cases seem to have been satisfactory or the reverse according to the conditions and the intelligence used in applying the old shoes.

Please tell me how to prevent water leaking out of the grease cups at either side of the water pump?

You are using too tight a grease gun.

These grease cups, with the result that when the motor gets warm the grease becomes very fluid and allows the water to leak. In hot weather you should use a heavy grease. Probably the hardest that you can buy will be the most satisfactory. However, as soon as cold weather sets in substitute a lighter grease.

On my car a universal joint is used between engine and transmission, this universal consisting of a cross floating in the yokes of clutch and shaft. The assembly, unless kept carefully adjusted, is noisy and does not retain oil for any length of time. Could I substitute a leather universal?

The joint between the engine and gear box is designed to take up any misalignment between the clutch and the gear shift, but it often happens that the gear box drops, throwing the shaft out of alignment to such an extent that the drive becomes noisy, and this is probably the cause of your trouble.

It is doubtful if the fitting of a leather universal would be wise, because, although it would silence the drive, it would take care of the misalignment, the noise which shows that there is a faulty alignment would be gone, and there would be no warning to enable you to know when to correct this. It occasionally happens that a sudden jolt will cause a drop in the level of the gear box due to a looseness in the bolts which hold it in position. This can be remedied by restoring the gear box to its proper alignment.

It is also very probable that the rear axle gears are badly out of adjustment and that the vibration produced as a result of this is transmitted to the joint between the engine and gear box and given off at that point. You should not only have the engine and gear set aligned, but also have the rear axle inspected and the gears readjusted, should it be necessary.

I change the oil in my crank case about every 500 or 600 miles. Would the oil I take out be all right to use in the transmission or would it wear the gears?

It is a good idea to use the oil from the crank case in the gear box. After use for considerable time in the motor the oil takes on a gummy consistency, which renders it unfit for good motor lubrication, but good for use in lubricating the gears in the gear box on account of its tendency to adhere to the gear teeth. It is better to strain it for use in the gear box.

My motor heats too much and the thermo-siphon system does not do its work properly or the heating is caused by another source. I believe my carburetor is adjusted properly, there is no slipping fan belt or loss of compression, but still the engine overheats. As the car has not been run over 3,000 miles the carbon cannot be the cause. Can you explain this?

It is most likely that your trouble is due to driving with the spark retarded too far, although it is impossible to say with certainty that this is so. Try driving your car with the spark advanced as far as possible at all times without the motor knocking.

There are many other things that might cause your motor to overheat, however—carbonized cylinders, poor water circulation, incorrect timing of motor, dragging brakes or possibly excessive friction. Just as you state, it is not likely that the trouble is caused by carbon, but in looking for the cause it is not wise to neglect this possibility, for the reason that motor troubles are often caused by the most unexpected circumstances. Note whether the water is circulating freely, and if not try to find where the trouble is, whether it is due to dirt, loose pieces of rubber obstructing the passages or what not. Remember that with a thermo-siphon system the water will not circulate at all as soon as the level drops below the discharge header in the top of the radiator. Circulation of water in the thermo-siphon system is dependent on the fact that the column of water, considered as such for simplicity, in the pipes and water jackets is lighter than the column in the radiator because it is warmer, and water expands and grows lighter as it is warmed. Therefore if the level of water drops below the outlet pipe circulation must stop. It is well to note whether you have not been running with the water below this point. Or it is possible that you have a slow leak and that in the course of an afternoon enough water leaks out to lower the level enough to stop the circulation, as described.

If there is dirt in the radiator flush it out thoroughly, and if there is any grease in the water wash it with a hot solution of sodium carbonate in water, one handful of carbonate to a gallon of water. See that the rubber hose connections are in good condition.

As a last resort check up the valve timing by the marks on the flywheel, and if there are no marks you had better write to the maker for information on this point.

USES FOR FLINT PEBBLES.

Imports From Europe May Be Restricted Because of the War.

In 1913 nearly $320,000 worth of flint pebbles were imported into the United States, mainly from Denmark and France. In these countries the flint occurs as irregular nodules in the chalk cliffs that border certain parts of the coast, and under the impact of the waves on the shore the hard flint becomes freed from its relatively soft chalk matrix and is gathered in great quantities from the beaches for shipment to all parts of the world. At their destination the more irregular nodules are chiseled and ground to a fine powder for use in pottery manufacture, but those that have been well rounded by the waves are reserved for use in tube mills, their hardness and chertiness making them a desirable grinding agent.

The United States geological survey reports that the cutting off of the imports of flint pebbles should work no material hardship to the pottery industry, as flint is used in that industry only in subordinate amounts compared with the crystalline quartz largely quarried in Connecticut, New York and Maryland, and as the supply of the quartz is far in excess of the present demands. A cutting off of the supply of rounded flint pebbles suitable for tube mill use would, it is probable, entail some inconvenience, for ready rounded flints are not known to occur in this country. Recourse might be had to artificial rounding of domestic flints, which are known to occur in abundance in the region near Anstus, Tex., where they weather out of beds of cretaceous chalk, or to the artificial rounding of white vitreous quartzites, which are known to occur at a few places in this country. Where a small amount of iron as an impurity would not be detrimental in the ground product, use might be made of rounded quartz pebbles such as occur in the valleys of many rivers that drain regions of crystalline rock—for example, the Potomac near Washington.

Rubber Tires For Street Cars.

At the recent session of the Transportation association of Great Britain in Newcastle one of the speakers suggested the introduction of rubber or some other silent material for tires to street cars. The speaker contended that a properly designed tire for street cars would exceed the life of tires on motor buses and motor wagons, on which a life of 20,000 miles and over was common; that the wear and tear on the roads would be reduced; that the cost of maintenance would be largely eliminated, and that the corrugation problem would be solved. The question of doing away with noise and vibration, it was contended, was a strong argument in favor of rubber tires. A higher rate of speed could also be attained, which the speaker placed at twenty miles an hour.—Consular Report.

Care of Automobile Drive Chains.

The wear that comes on exposed drive chains is caused mostly by dust and grit settling on and mixing with the lubricant on the chain. This wear is more noticeable on trucks than on any other vehicle. It is a fact that chains will last nearly twice as long if they are removed and thoroughly cleaned in gasoline and then boiled in paraffin wax. When cool the wax becomes hard and keeps the bearings and moving parts well lubricated. This stops the rattle and furnishes a coating to which dust will not adhere readily.

Starting the Motor.

When the motor starts hard and you are uncertain whether the fault is with the fuel or the mixture, open the throttle wide and spin the engine with spark off. Then turn on the spark, and the engine should start. If the spark is correct so the first half turn.

AVOID FROZEN ROOTS.

Frost Bitten Vegetables Are Unsafe Feed For Live Stock.

"Never feed frost bitten potatoes, roots or other vegetables to live stock; the risk is too great."

This is the advice of an experienced stockman who knows of the trouble and even losses which are almost certain to follow feeding frozen food of any kind.

"At this time of the year farmers are often tempted to utilize waste vegetable and roots by feeding them to cows, hoping that no harm will result if the roots have been frozen trouble naturally follows."

"The introduction of heavy, chilled vegetable matter into the stomach of an animal naturally causes a sudden reaction, and it is not unlikely that the food value of the material is much reduced. Stockmen cannot afford to take any chances in feeding frozen vegetables to their herds and flocks."—Wisconsin Experiment Station.

Distemper In Horses.

Distemper in a horse will run a full course and cannot be stopped by the use of medicine. Any symptoms which appear should be treated according to their severity. The use of proper grain feeds and a course of tonics is about all that is necessary in mild cases. If no access appears in the region of the throat these, of course, should be opened, well drained and the cavities flushed with an antiseptic solution. As a treatment for intestinal worms give a pint of raw linseed oil to which has been added one ounce of turpentine the same to be given for three consecutive days. Following this give a tablespoonful twice daily of a mixture of equal parts of salt, powdered iron sulphate and sulphur for ten days.

Hint For Hog Raisers.

It is a common mistake with many to try to keep too many sows, or more than they can give proper attention to during the periods of pregnancy birth and suckling. During all three periods they must be cared for correctly if good results are expected with the litter.

ZUDORA In the Twenty Million Dollar Mystery

By HAROLD MACGRATH

Copyright, 1914 and 1915, by Harold MacGrath

SYNOPSIS.

Zudora is left an orphan at an early age. Her father is killed in a gold mine. Zudora and the fortune from the mine, which grows to be worth $200,000, are left in the guardianship of Frank Keena, Zudora's mother's brother, who has set himself up as a Hindu mystic and is known as Hassam Ali. He decides that Zudora must die before she can have a chance to come into possession of her money, so that it may be left to him, the next of kin. Hassam Ali sees an obstacle to his scheme in the person of John Storm, a young lawyer, for whom Zudora has taken a fancy, and he commands the girl to put the man out of her mind. Zudora insists that if she cannot marry Storm she will marry no one.

"Well, well," says Hassam Ali, "solve my next twenty cases and you can marry him; fail in a single case and you must renounce him."

Zudora unravels a mystery and wins her first case—a case in which John Storm is saved from being convicted of a murder instigated by Hassam Ali himself.

Zudora and Hassam Ali visit Nebok Shan's house, where she overcomes every one whenever Nebok attempts to marry a princess. Storm, seeking Zudora, is made a prisoner. Zudora follows Nebok Shan, restores the princess to her original lover and saves Storm from death.

A maker of diamonds tells Hassam Ali his secret. Storm informs Zudora that his life is being attempted frequently. Storm suspects Hassam Ali. Storm is arrested for stealing the diamond maker's gems, but Zudora discovers the real thieves—a pair of mice.

The negro help employed on Storm's father's farm are seeing because a great skeleton hand appears at night upon a hill near by. Storm is baffled in his investigation, but Zudora learns that her uncle has employed Jimmy Bolton, a half-witted man, thus to annoy Storm's parents. Zudora finds Bolton operating a big magic lantern and is attacked by him. Storm appears and saves her.

Hassam Ali asks Zudora to find a gem lost by two men—Zudora and Storm. Storm gets a photograph of the gem and it burns in her hand. An old house is mined by Hassam Ali and the old men. Storm and Zudora are lured and narrowly escape destruction when the house blows up.

John McWilder, endeavoring to trap and kill George Smith, is killed himself, and Smith is charged with murder. Hassam Ali conspires to have John Storm meet the same fate as McWilder, and he and Storm are overcome by powerful fumes. Zudora saves them, proves that McWilder's own dog trapped and killed him and saves Smith from a band of lynchers.

An inventor blows up a submarine with a powerful heat ray which he sends through water. Hassam Ali sends Zudora to a photographer directly beneath the inventor's laboratory and orders the inventor to kill her. Zudora gets a warning, and her life is saved. The heat ray machine is destroyed, and the photographer, after a quarrel with Hassam Ali, is found dead in the river.

Wu Chang prevents Zudora's elopement with John Storm by hypnotizing her, and he and Hassam Ali attempt to smuggle her out of the country. This plot is frustrated by Storm.

Baird, Hassam Ali's double, falls in love with Zudora. Baird and Mrs. Du Val kidnap Zudora and the Van Wick child. Storm rescues them, and Hassam Ali dies.

With Hassam Ali dead Zudora is released of her pledges to solve twenty cases. She confronts, however, the greatest mystery of all, which is the mystery of her own life, and the ambition to secure the vast fortune of $200,000 left to her. The great photo serial is being shown in the leading moving picture theaters by the Thanhouser Film Corporation. Among those participating are Marguerite Snow, Mary Elizabeth Forbes, James Cruze, in the new role of reporter-here, Sidney Bracey and Frank Parrington.

On looking through her uncle's papers Zudora finds that her father left her an interest in a diamond mine, and Storm and Baird both lend assistance in trying to regain for her possession of this estate which is being appropriated by rogues under the leadership of Mrs. Du Val. They plan to frighten Zudora so that she will run away. Failing, they kidnap Zudora and Howard, the mine superintendent, and put them in a private insane asylum. Howard dies, but Zudora, nearly famished, is rescued by Storm and his friends. Detective Hunt and Baird find the Zudora gold mine.

Mrs. Copeland's jewels are stolen, but recovered through the cleverness of Hunt and Baird. They investigate the mysteries of Mrs. Du Val's house. A map of a mine is stolen from Zudora, who later is kidnapped and held prisoner.

CHAPTER XVIII. The Cipher Code.

BUT Storm found no one at Craig Island, for the simple reason that his approach was seen and Zudora and all things belonging to her were nicely hidden out of sight. He returned to the city disconsolate. He let work go and haunted the office of Hunt for the greater part of each day. But Hunt was still in Africa or was in the high seas.

And when Baird and Hunt did return, as recounted in the preceding chapter, they learned that they had been nicely fooled. Radcliffe had not left Africa at all, but had decided to remain at the mines until he had fully recovered from his injuries in the wreck. And a fine idea came into his head while convalescing.

The idea was this: The man Hunt was sailing close to the wind. He was getting nearer and nearer. Why not gather all the stones possible in a move against Hunt's winning out in the last phase of the game? No half a dozen fine stones, but the last six months' total output, something priceless, like that? He, Radcliffe, was not needed in New York. The bawling up he had received at the hands of Baird and subsequent wreck had left him to a shaky way. The voyage to Africa and back would put him firmly upon his feet once more.

On the voyage Radcliffe took particularly good care of himself, drank nothing and moderated his smoking. He forewore cards and went to bed early. By the time he reached Cape Town he was as fit as a fiddle and felt quite satisfied with himself.

He was ready for any deviltry.

Taking these hours of loneliness he thought a good deal. Much as he loved Mrs. Du Val, she had an iron hand, and the fact was beginning to irk him. Why couldn't she accept his idea to quit now and go away while the going was good, to use the parlance of the day? Money? They had plenty. The game, the game; that was her eternal cry; the sport of it, the excitement. She went out of her way dozens of times to court danger, and there was danger, real and menacing. They had all kinds of documents to substantiate their claims to Zudora's fortune, but there was many a slip 'twixt the cup and the lip. She was like a gambler who had played for high stakes. She never again could find zest in a friend by game. Perhaps she was only playing with him, having need of him as a chessman in her dangerous game. If that was the case, she would indeed find it a dangerous game. No woman had ever yet made a fool of Captain Radcliffe.

The next boat sailed in two weeks. So, instead of going down to Cape Town, he idled about the mine, picking up odd bits of information which he stored away for future use. There was no excess lumber in Captain Radcliffe's brain. Where was that other find? Neither his side nor the other could as yet locate that mysterious bed of crystals. He started out to do some exploring on his own hook, but nothing important came of it.

But he was tired of the incessant war against Hunt and Baird. He wanted a time, a month or two of princely gambling, ten or twenty thousand to do with as he pleased. For weeks he had crushed down the instinct, but this enforced inactivity had given it renewed life. He must have his fling.

When he stepped on board the ship which was to carry him back to America it was the happiest moment he had known in months. Back to little old New York, with its confusion, its noise, its lights, its excitement! No more idea for him if he could prevent it.

When the ship stood off Nantucket light he sought the wireless office and dispatched a code message to Bruce, which read as follows:

J. W. Bruce, New York:
Sinbad X. Y. Z. Burton Aurenla, Esq.
Ride Turner Riprah Mecca Zib Lover
RADCLIFFE

"Going to blow on the city hall?" asked the operator as he studied the message.

"No, just the Brooklyn bridge," Radcliffe laughed, paying for the message and giving a generous tip. Then he returned to the smoke room and played a round of cards. He won two games out of ten and felt quite satisfied with himself.

Bruce was busily engaged in work when the wireless arrived. He smiled and spread it out on the blotter and with pen and ink began to decipher it. When he completed the translation he was highly elated. He would not have been, however, had he known that every move he made was being watched, that nearly every move he had made since his return from Africa had been watched either by Baird or by Hunt. It was Baird who was watching him at this particular moment from rather a perilous position outside the office window.

Bruce thrust the cipher between the two blotters of his writing pad, picked up his hat and coat and hurried away. He must see Mrs. Du Val at once.

No sooner was he gone than Baird entered quietly. He tiptoed to the desk, watching the door as he did so. Bruce might return unexpectedly. From out of the blotters he drew the wireless cipher and the translation. He rubbed his chin and smiled. He had begun to feel rather bored watching Mr. Bruce day in and day out, with no definite results. If Bruce knew anything regarding the whereabouts of Zudora he kept this knowledge most carefully to himself. Hunt would enjoy reading this dispatch. It was really the smashing proof he had been seeking for months. Here was his smuggler, all nicely done up in a package, ready for delivery.

Arrive New York steamer Aurenla. Will throw rubber bag of diamonds overboard before landing. RADCLIFFE.

Both of them! All depended upon getting hold of that bag of diamonds. Duclio Sam would do the rest with pleasure. Baird made a copy of the wireless and its translation. The Marconi company would back him up in case Radcliffe denied sending such a cipher. It was all as easy as falling off a log. He would have taken the originals but for the fear that Bruce would return and find them gone and warn Radcliffe. So he had to content himself with copies.

He immediately sought out Hunt, with whom he found Storm, pale and thin through worry and anxiety regarding his sweetest.

"I've got them, Hunt!"

"Zudora?" cried Storm.

"No, my friend. But I've got two men red handed in the smuggling game. I have followed Bruce for days, but if he knows anything about Zudora's prison he's keeping it to himself. I've seen him with no suspicious characters. Here, Hunt, read these and cheer up."

"Fine work, Baird; fine work! You drop your newspaper business and hang your shingle up with mine. And the boat comes in this afternoon. Let's get down to the dock. Will you go along, Storm?"

"Heaven knows I haven't anything else to do. That note in the bottle took me nowhere. I couldn't find anything at the island. Well, there is this much to say—I'll kill with my own hands any man who has harmed or offered indignities to Zudora."

"And we'll help you, boy," agreed Hunt. "But let us first trap two previous rogues. Who knows? We may be asking them into custody and ourselves pretty near Zudora."

"What do you mean?"

"Keep your hair on and follow me."

"Have you found out something?" cried Baird.

"That remains to be seen," answered the detective noncommittally.

So the three of them started off for the water front in various degrees of excitement.

In the meantime Zudora waited and watched the sea from her window. Time after time she saw motorboats headed for the island; time after time she saw them change their course and go chugging past, too far out of range for a shot. She dared not call out to the men who were absolutely assured that the motorboat contained rescuers. She was in truth, greatly afraid of the terrible old hag who acted as her jailer. Several times during drunken spells she had pinched Zudora's arms cruelly and jeered at her. Money alone would win over such a beast, and she had nothing; even her clothes were falling in tatters.

One day she spoke to the old woman. "Can you get me some warmer clothes?" "Oh, it's warmer clothes, is it? Any kind of furs you'd prefer? Black fox

Has Used a Majestic Range For Over Twelve Years

It hardly seems possible that any Range could be used this length of time, but the following sworn affidavit of R. T. Mears states that he has used a Majestic Range in his home for this length of time, and that today, as far as he can see, the range is good for many years more of service. Read what he says about the Majestic:

State of Michigan,
County of Charlevoix, ss.

R. T. Mears, being duly sworn, deposes and says that he has used a Majestic Range in his home for the past twelve years. Deponent further swears that during this time he has spent but 75c for repairs on said Majestic Range, and that today the range is in splendid condition and shows but little evidence of its long usage. Deponent further says that during a greater portion of this time he has burned coal in the above mentioned range; and that he has never had to replace any of the parts of the fire box, and that the fire back is, from all that he can see, as good as ever.

R. T. MEARS.

Subscribed to before me this 18th day of May, A. D., 1915.

L. E. BENTON, Notary Public.

My commission expires July 13, 1915.

What better recommendation can a Range be given than that above by Mr. Mears for the Majestic.

Users of the Majestic from all parts of the country give testimony of the same nature. If you want a range that is a fuel saver, easy to operate, one that will LAST, the Majestic is the one to buy.

is fashionable just now. "But I am cold. I will give you a thousand dollars if you will free me!" "All right. Fork over the thousand and I'll land you home tonight."

Zudora turned away so that the miserable old woman would not have the satisfaction of witnessing her tears.

"Write a note, dearie, and I'll see if I can't get you some fresh togs. But mind, no tricks; plain English and no cipher stuff, or it don't git off th' island."

"You mean it?" cried Zudora, with wild excitement.

"Yes. Hurry up. I'm goin' t' have visitors juske of an hour."

Zudora found a magazine, ripped off a page and scribbled on the margin:

Mrs. Ramsey, 16 Willow Grove Avenue:
I am not permitted to tell place of my imprisonment. But please give bearer a change of clothing for me.

ZUDORA.

The bag carried out the note and locked the door.

By and by Zudora heard the rumble of a motorboat. It landed at the dock. Later she heard a low murmur of voices and once the high raucous laughter. They had fooled her a dozen times. Maybe they would fool her again.

The visitor was Mrs. Du Val. She read the note carefully and signified that there could be no danger in letting Zudora have some fresh clothes. She would have Gyp take the note, and Gyp was the hardest young man in New York to follow. Things had gone so smoothly for Mrs. Du Val that she had begun to crave a little excitement.

There certainly was excitement when Mrs. Ramsey received that altered note.

"It will take me about five minutes," she said as calmly as she could, "Would $1,000 be of any use to you?"

"Fork over th' thousand and I'll land yuh home tonight."

MANY an industry in this country today has been revived from death by the European war. Such an industry is the manufacture of waxed or greaseproof paper, a commodity which has come into increasing use in the daily life of the American people as a wrapper for all kinds of food products.

This kind of paper requires for its production selected raw material and special milling equipment; and under the ample protection afforded to it by the McKinley, the Dingley and the Payne tariff bills, plants for the production of this paper sprang up in several parts of the country, and developed an annual production which increased almost at a geometric ratio by reason of the increasing necessity for the use of the product as required by pure food laws and by the demand of the purchasing public for more complete and sanitary protection of food-product packages. For example, it is interesting to note that a single small plant in New England furnished monthly to one manufacturer of chewing gum, a carload of waxed paper to be used for wrapping; while every housewife is familiar with the wrapped loaf of bread which, through the ingenuity of American mechanics, now comes to her direct from the oven, through a machine, and is put into her hand in a tightly sealed wrapping of waxed paper.

Under the Payne tariff law, this paper bore a commodity tax of 2 and 1-2 cents a pound and 10 per cent ad valorem; and in 1912 there was imported into this country waxed paper to the value of $213,000 which paid a duty of $104,- 000. The Underwood tariff reduced this protection to 35 per cent ad valorem, striking off substantially one-third of the protection hitherto enjoyed by this product; and immediately the German manufacturers of waxed paper began to take possession of American markets. And on the first of July, 1914, the imports of waxed paper from Germany alone had increased nearly 50 per cent over those of the year previous. The American manufacturers of waxed paper were being driven from their own market by the operations of a Democratic tariff law—when along came the war bringing their salvation.

The war saved the waxed paper business from the effects of a Democratic tariff; but the war cannot save the Democratic administration from the effects of a Democratic tariff.

The Carnegie Hero Fund has just made awards for 52 deeds of daring;
but the list does not contain the name of the man who tried to keep his factory running on full time under the Underwood tariff law.

Just supposing we had to go to war and a lot of our boys were shot. Wouldn't it be funny if the army surgeons picked out a lot of bullets with "Made in U.
S. A." stamped on them.

A citizen who knows off hand all the different kinds of taxes he pays is something of an expert on government as well as a mathematician.

Whether Roosevelt really said he was the man to "rip up" Wilson or not, it's true; and he will have a chance to demonstrate it next year.

SUBSTITUTES FOR POTASH.

There seems to be no real substitute for commercial potash that will be available this year at reasonable prices, says Board's Bulletin.

It is generally recommended that sulphate of potash is the desirable form for use in potato culture, while wood ashes, because they seem to create conditions favorable to the growth of scab, do not make a good form of potash.

In view of the above facts we suggest the use of well rotted manure this spring or of a field that was manured last fall. If this is not available and the land needs re-enforcement nitrate of soda, tankage and acid phosphate may be used. We would omit the use of potash entirely this year unless it can be procured at a reasonable price.

It is quite possible that deeper plowing will bring up to the surface an additional supply of potash that will be sufficient for the next few years.

SMALL FARMER'S TRADING.

He Is Under Serious Handicap Compared With His Bigger Competitor.
[Prepared by the United States department of agriculture.]

A matter which threatens the prosperity and even the existence of the small farmer is the handicap under which he finds himself in buying and selling. The big farmer who can buy and sell in large quantities and also employ expert talent in buying and selling and in securing credit has an advantage over the small farmer who must buy and sell in small quantities and give his time and attention mainly to the growing of crops rather than to selling them.

Much of the supposed economy of large scale production, even in merchandising and manufacturing, is found upon examination to consist wholly in an advantage in bargaining—that is, buying and selling. When it comes to the work of growing farm crops, as distinct from selling them and buying raw materials, the one family farm is the most efficient unit that has yet been found.

But the big farmer can best the individual small farmer in buying and selling. It would seem desirable, from the standpoint of national efficiency, to preserve the small farm as the productive unit, but to organize a number of small farms into larger units for buying and selling. Thus we should have the most efficient units both in producing and in buying and selling.

If this is not done the only farmers who can enter successfully into the production of agricultural specialties, where the problem of marketing is greater than the problem of producing, will be the big, capitalistic farmers.
The small farmer may hold his own in the growing of staple crops, to which field the problem of efficient production is perhaps greater than that of successful marketing.

The reason for this is that there is a well organized market for staple crops and the problem of marketing is therefore somewhat less difficult than in the case of agricultural specialties. But even in the growing of staple crops the small farmer will have a hard time of it if he is forced to compete with the big farm when it is cultivated by gangs of cheap laborers.

The two worst enemies of the small farmer are the opponents of co-operative buying and selling on the one hand and the advocates of colored immigration to the rural districts on the other.
The latter would help the big farmer in the buying of labor for his farm and reduce the price of the small farmer's own labor when he undertook to sell it in the form of produce.

Chain Propelled Grindstone.

I took two spricket wheels, one smaller than the other, off an old blinder. I put the smaller wheel on the shaft of the grindstone where I took the crank off, says a writer in Farm and Fireside.
Then I put the larger wheel at one end of the frame. To make boxes for the shaft of the larger wheel I took two pieces of sheet iron and bent them (A) and drilled holes in each side (B). I then took the crank and placed it on the end of the shaft of the larger wheel.

A chain from the blinder was placed over both wheels. This device is very handy for grinding mowing machine knives, as the person turning is out of the way.

Spare the Birds; Save the Crops.

Bird hunting is carried on under no strait at all by legitimate sports, but bird slaughter is merely a means of increasing calamity. Take as one little instance the "sculp net" of Pennsylvania, which paid in bounties $90,000 for the extermination of hawks and owls.
These "pests" were destroyed, but the small rodents upon which they fed ruined on the farmer and did almost $1,000,000 worth of damage. Our bird friends possess infinitely more than enough to control the insect pests and their intervention in the case of nature's enemies is a disaster.

Keep in touch with what is going on.
Read the Courier; that's the best way.

When an editor makes a mistake there is a lawsuit and a warning and a big there is a funeral, cut flowers and pera yard long without him or anyone else knowing what it means; but if the editor uses one he has to spell it. If the doctor goes to see another man's wife he charges for the visit, but if the editor goes he gets a charge of buckshot. When the doctor gets drunk it is a case of being overdone by the heat and if he dies it is from heart trouble. When the editor gets drunk it is a case of too much booze, and if he dies it is the jim-jams. Any old college

An old farmer and his wife lived near the village church. One warm Sunday evening, while they sat dozing on the porch, the crickets set up a loud chirping. "I just love that chirpin' noise," said the old man drowsily, and before the crickets had stopped he was fast asleep. Soon after the church choir broke into a chant. "Just listen to that," exclaimed his wife, "ain't it beautiful?" "Yes," murmured the old farmer sleepily, "they do it with their hind legs."

He was on his first trip and he decided to keep a diary. The first night as he sat in the sleeping car, the conductor came through and said: "An old lady is sick in the chair car, will anyone change places with her?" "I will," volunteered our young hero. And that night he wrote in his diary: "Up all night—gave birth to an old lady—am all in."

NO TUBERCULAR SIGNS

Dairy Herd of Elmer Ingalls Examined by Veterinary Surgeon.

The fine dairy herd of Elmer Ingalls, one of Charlevoix's successful farmers living south of the city, were subjected to a thorough examination Monday and Tuesday of this week for tubercular germs by Dr. A. F. McGreevy.

The examination was made upon the request of Mr. Ingalls, and the result of the test was that absolutely no signs of tubercular trouble was discovered.
The herd consists of 30 head of fine cows, and the fine condition they were found to be in is very gratifying to their owner.

This is one of the first tubercular tests held in this vicinity, and the results have been sent to the State Live Stock Sanitary Commission at Lansing.

FOREST FIRES RAGING

Condition Growing Quite Serious in the Vicinity of Boyne Falls.

Forest fires both northwest and southwest of Alanson have been causing considerable worry and some damage for several days past. The barn on the Ormsby farm near Alanson has been destroyed, and the house had a close call.

East of Alanson the fire has been burning for several days. Hard work saved a valuable lot of timber owned by the McManus Lumber company. A large number of men are engaged day and night in this vicinity fighting the fire.

At Boyne Falls every available man has been hired to fight the fires south and east of that place. The work is in charge of Deputy Fire Warden W. J.
Pearson. The recent dry weather has made the fighting strenuous. Flames are still confined to shrub and undergrowth, but if rain does not come soon, valuable timber holding will be burning.

BAPTIST CHURCH NOTES

BY THE PASTOR

We were greeted with a full house at Marion Sunday. The Lord was with our work and as we spoke the Holy Spirit moved with power on our audience, and men and women were moved to tears but still said no to God. Oh, why will young men and young women, as well as old ones, drive away the "Heavenly Dove" when he speaks so plainly to them? God has said, "My Spirit shall not always strive with man."

Two car loads of our folks went out with us Sunday and furnished some excellent music.

We greatly enjoyed the Baccalaureate given by Rev. Taggart at the M. E. church Sunday night to the Normal class. If this excellent class of young people only get "Vision" in their lives, his Brother Taggart labored so earnestly that it might be so, they will find that the possibilities of a human life are unbounded. Only give God a chance.

We will hold no service next Sunday evening, but attend the Baccalaureate Senior H. S. at the M. E. church. I hope all our people that possibly can will attend these school exercises.

Don't fail to remember that our prayer service Thursday evening is at an early hour that we may attend the school program in the M. E. church.

The Bible says: "I can do all things through Christ." How many things does all things mean?

All our people are requested to attend the Commencement at M. E. church on Wednesday evening.

We have the Automobile Tires with 4,000 and 5,000 miles adjustment.

Making the Little Farm Pay

By C. C. BOWSFIELD

Spring is the most critical time for the chicken industry. Success or failure turns on the care and skill shown during the hatching period and while the weather is wet and changeable.

Wise farmers and poultry fanciers are not in the habit of neglecting their fowls at any time, but they give them extra attention in early spring, not merely to keep them healthy, but to secure hardy stock and good layers. Chickens are as sensitive as human beings, and their diseases are much the same. The most common ailments in the poultry yard are colds in their various stages. These have a variety of names, but they result from neglect at a time of year when special care is needed. Croup, bronchitis, pneumonia and rheumatism are prevalent among fowls at times, and while a majority of the sick birds may recover such illness is sure to affect the general vitality of the flock. There are many things to be considered along this line.

Too many poultrymen do not recognize the importance of the health and vitality of the breeding stock from which they are to secure their chickens for future use. Unless the breeding stock is healthy and vigorous and in the best of condition satisfaction cannot be secured in the offspring.

Breed for health and vigor to be successful and keep stock healthy by good care, feeding and housing. If eggs run low in fertility and chicks die in the shell or soon after hatching do not blame the incubator too quickly, but first investigate the conditions and surroundings of the breeding stock. Cleanliness is another important factor. Do not give fowls food or water that is not perfectly clean. Avoid feeding rusty or sour grains, as this would produce sick fowls.

To restore the vitality of the flocks now affected by wet weather diseases experts agree that prompt treatment is required. If chickens are allowed to run down from roup or bronchitis the flock will soon be attacked by pneumonia and cholera.

Raising chickens, like raising any other kind of stock on the farm, will be more or less profitable according to the degree of knowledge and painstaking devoted to it. Some people insist there is more profit in raising chickens on the farm than any other kind of domestic stock, provided the breed is good and they have the proper care.

In the first place, there should be a comfortable house to shelter them from the inclemency of the weather and keep them from roosting in the tool sheds. The building need not be expensive, but must have a good roof to keep out the rain, and the walls must be tight enough to keep out the wind. On the farm, when it is possible, let the chickens have free range and allow them to forage for themselves. With out visiting the grain fields, hens on a farm with their liberty will obtain more than half their living free of cost to their owner, and the food they secure promotes their health and favors egg production. They pick up scattered grain in the barnyard, feed on grass, weed seed, worms, bugs, grasshoppers and all kinds of insect pests. The stomach of a healthy hen is a good judge of the kind of food it requires to perform its proper function of sustaining the body and promoting egg production. If hens have a craving appetite for worms and bugs it is because their nature requires them. A starving hen, like a starving man, might be forced by hunger to eat something that was unwholesome, but she ought not to be allowed to get so hungry as that.

The Woman of It

"I never saw any one so obstinate and set as John is."

"You surprise me!"

"Yes, indeed. Why, only this morning we had a dispute, but I stood firm and told him he might move the pyramids, but he couldn't budge me when my mind was made up."

"And he finally admitted that he was wrong?"

"Well, about the same thing. He said, 'Have your own way, Marjorie.'"

"Of course. But what was the argument about?"

"Oh, I haven't the slightest recollection, but it was the principle, you know."—St. Louis Post-Dispatch.

OPEN WEDNESDAY AND SATURDAY EVENINGS

Pruning For Wood.

In pruning for wood the following rules are usually applicable. Weak growing varieties may always be pruned generously, strong growing kinds lightly; varieties which branch freely need little pruning, those having unbranching limbs should be pruned more severely; rich, deep soils favor growth, prune trees in such soils lightly; in shallow, sandy soils trees produce short shoots, and the wood should be closely cut.

Feeding Growing Pigs.

If the swine are in the fattening stage they should have all they will eat up clean, but growing animals should have just enough to keep them in a thrifty growing condition.

PASTURE FOR HOGS.

Rape and Oats Seeded Together Make an Excellent Forage.

Ground in which rape is to be sown should be plowed, harrowed and put in good condition just as for corn, says the Iowa Homestead. It may be seeded broadcast at the rate of three pounds to the acre or sown in drill rows thirty inches apart, at the rate of two pounds to the acre. For pasture it would be well to sow about one-fourth acre as early in the spring as the ground can be worked. The crop will be ready for pasture in about two months.

Rape may be seeded with oats to good advantage, and the oats will furnish some of the grain which hogs should have if kept on rape alone. Where they have access to clover they will need little grain during the summer months. An acre of rape has been found sufficient to pasture twenty hogs for three months when fed a small amount of grain, therefore it will ordinarily yield as much as twenty tons to the acre.

Silage For Ewes.

Almost any silage that is in good condition is good as a succulent feed to help in the making of milk, says the Farm and Fireside. But it must not be expected to bring ewes up to lambing unless in moderation and in connection with dry food. A good dry ration consists of one-half pound oats mixed with one-third its bulk of bran and as much clover alfalfa or meadow hay as the animals will eat. The half pound of oats may gradually be increased to one pound. A diet of silage or any succulent feed given alone is likely to produce weakness and lack of stamina in the ewes and result in a small crop of poor lambs. Even when the ewes and lambs go to pasture it will pay to keep up a moderate grain ration.

Selecting a Hog Breed.

There is no best breed of hogs, says T. E. McNeely in National Stockman. All our modern breeds are good if they are properly selected and are represented by good individuals. In selecting a breed there are several points to keep in mind. Choose a breed that has proved to be well adapted to the locality in which the hogs are to be raised.

Dacca Muslins.

Dacca, in eastern Bengal, had a special interest for Thackeray since his grandfather, after whom he was named, laid the basis of his fortune as a factor there. And in the novelist's day the name, as old people among us will still remember, was synonymous with exquisitely diaphanous textiles, though as a matter of fact the rarest of these "webs of woven wind," "evening dew," "running waters"—such were some of the names given the most delicate of the Dacca muslins—seldom passed beyond the city walls. There is a well authenticated case of the thread being spun into muslin in the proportion of 120 miles to the pound avoirdupois—London Chronicle.

Gyp smiled. "Nothing doing in that line, madam. Just get me the clothes. That's what I'm here for."

As Mrs. Ramsey went up to Zudora's room another idea occurred to her. She telephoned Hunt what was taking place, and that was the shrewdest thing she could have done.

"What's the chap look like?" asked Hunt over the telephone.

Mrs. Ramsey described Gyp accurately.

"Good work! That will be Gyp the gun man. I'll keep watch. Don't worry, and don't attempt anything on your own hook."

Mrs. Ramsey got together some of Zudora's winter clothing. From one of the skirts she ripped a hem, and inside this she placed a little note of cheer and courage, sewing it up with white thread in order to attract Zudora's attention. She managed to stretch out the promised five minutes into nearly half an hour. After that she dared not wait any longer. The messenger might become suspicious and put the bundle in Gyp's arms.

In Less Than a Moment She Had the Note in Her Trembling Hand.

"You took your time," he growled.

"I had trouble in getting into her trunk. You are not to be trifled, then?"

"If I was sure they wouldn't cut my throat. So long!" he jeered as he turned down the steps.

Hunt worked diligently the rest of that day, but when he saw Storm that night he kept silent. When the proper time came he would have a surprise for the young lawyer.

When the clothes came to Zudora she experienced the first bit of pleasure since her imprisonment. Clean clothes to a dainty woman such as she was meant pleasure under any circumstance. She came upon the white thread and eyed it wonderingly. There had been no tear in that skirt the last time she had worn it. And Mrs. Ramsey certainly would not have used white thread. Her heart bounded.

She felt the crinkle of paper under her fingers. In less than a moment she had the note in her trembling hands. She read it, then destroyed it and hid the bits of paper in the four corners of the room. Hunt would find her. The reaction caused her to break down and weep.

The old lamp glowed the sound, but he credited it to a bit of sentimentalism.

Hunt did not go directly to the ship dock. Instead he engaged a motorboat and a launch. Even that was curious to learn what was going to happen.

"I'm not saying a word; just wait. There may be trouble, but I want the biggest trouble out of the way first."

"You know where Zudora is, and we are going for her?" cried Storm.

Hunt shrugged and gave the eager order. They left the motorboat about a quarter of a mile off the shore and rowed toward shore in the dinghy. Zudora was always looking out of the window, and when she espied the dinghy and a moment later recognized a familiar head she almost fainted with joy.

Storm laid his finger against his lips and tossed up a rope's end, which she caught. She drew it inside and made it fast. Then Storm went up the rope and pulled her. At the bottom of the rope was a slip-knot. Into this Zudora put her foot, and Storm lowered her down to him and Hunt, below.

They pulled her up and

"My girl, my girl!" murmured Storm.

Zudora put her head against his shoulder. She wept, and nothing else the world.

Baird sighed. He wondered if there was in all the world a woman for him.

"Where now?" he asked of Hunt.

"Why, I thought that we'd run alongside the Aurora. If there's a bag of diamonds going overboard I'd like to be on hand. Well, Miss Zudora, it took a long time to locate you, but we did it. Your wanting fresh clothing was a good idea. Now, Storm, when Baird and I reach the motorboat you row to the old dock. There'll be a taxi near by. You two get into it and bike for home."

"God bless you, Hunt!" said Storm.

Storm lowered her down to Baird and Hunt.

Storm Lowered Her Down to Baird and Hunt.

"Don't let that worry you. Nothing pleases me better than to help up a precious crook when he thinks he's got the better of me. Go home and good luck with you. And Storm, if you let any one steal her away from you this trip I'll take no hand in bringing her back to you. There you go!"

Hunt and Baird climbed into the motorboat and waved their hands. Storm took up the oars again.

"I'm so tired, John, so tired!"

"I've had no sleep for weeks. I've traveled a thousand miles and followed ten thousand clues. And I'd not have you in this boat, girl, but for a streak of luck and a bit of foresight on the part of Mrs. Ramsey, who called up Hunt on the telephone when the fellow came for your clothes. Thank God, I have you back. We'll get the color back into your cheeks again, and by the way Hunt talks there'll be a round-up of those precious rogues before another month is gone."

It was a long row to the main shore, but Storm was so happy that he took no note of time. There were a good deal of embracing and kissing when at length Zudora thrust herself into the arms of the motherly Mrs. Ramsey.

As Baird and Hunt neared the steamship Aurora they saw another motorboat bobbing in the shadow of the river. They both recognized the occupants of this launch, and it behooved them to act quickly.

"Look!" exclaimed Hunt. "There's that man Radcliffe leaning over the rail. By George! A hot water bottle filled with gins and our tight! It's filled to be on a case like this, Baird. When he drops it I'll run for it, only catch good hold of my leg when I lean over. There it comes!"

The long struck the water with a plop and after a moment bobbed up again.

Hunt did not go directly to the ship dock. Instead he engaged a motorboat and a launch. Even that was curious to learn what was going to happen.

"I'm not saying a word; just wait. There may be trouble, but I want the biggest trouble out of the way first."

Storm laid his finger against his lips and tossed up a rope's end, which she caught. She drew it inside and made it fast. Then Storm went up the rope and pulled her. At the bottom of the rope was a slip-knot. Into this Zudora put her foot, and Storm lowered her down to him and Hunt, below.

They pulled her up and

"My girl, my girl!" murmured Storm.

the world.

Baird sighed. He wondered if there was in all the world a woman for him.

"Where now?" he asked of Hunt.

"Why, I thought that we'd run alongside the Aurora. If there's a bag of diamonds going overboard I'd like to be on hand. Well, Miss Zudora, it took a long time to locate you, but we did it. Your wanting fresh clothing was a good idea. Now, Storm, when Baird and I reach the motorboat you row to the old dock. There'll be a taxi near by. You two get into it and bike for home."

"God bless you, Hunt!" said Storm.

Storm lowered her down to Baird and Hunt.

"Don't let that worry you. Nothing pleases me better than to help up a precious crook when he thinks he's got the better of me. Go home and good luck with you. And Storm, if you let any one steal her away from you this trip I'll take no hand in bringing her back to you. There you go!"

Hunt and Baird climbed into the motorboat and waved their hands. Storm took up the oars again.

"I'm so tired, John, so tired!"

"I've had no sleep for weeks. I've traveled a thousand miles and followed ten thousand clues. And I'd not have you in this boat, girl, but for a streak of luck and a bit of foresight on the part of Mrs. Ramsey, who called up Hunt on the telephone when the fellow came for your clothes. Thank God, I have you back. We'll get the color back into your cheeks again, and by the way Hunt talks there'll be a round-up of those precious rogues before another month is gone."

It was a long row to the main shore, but Storm was so happy that he took no note of time. There were a good deal of embracing and kissing when at length Zudora thrust herself into the arms of the motherly Mrs. Ramsey.

From the Kitchen.

Has it ever struck you what a number of terms belonging to cuisine are applied to men under different circumstances? Sometimes he is "basted," he "bolls with rage," is "baked" with heat and "burns" with love or jealousy. He is often "cut up," "devoured" with a flame and "done brown." We "dress" his jacket for him. Sometimes he is "eaten up" with care, and occasionally he is "fried." We "cook" his "goose"—for him, and often he makes a "goose" of himself. We make a "hash" of him, and sometimes he makes a hash of something else. He gets into "hot water" and sometimes into a "mess," is made into "mince meat" and is often in a "pickle." We are often asked to "toast" him, and he is frequently put into a "stew" or is in a "stew," no one knows why. A "soft" is "half baked," and one severely handled is well "peppered." A cheeky young larp is a "saucer box," and a rich father is made to "fork" out.—Dundee Advertiser

First Wheel Clock.

Some say that Archimedes made the first wheel clock as early as 200 B. C. Others give credit to Wallingford, who lived so late as the beginning of the fourteenth century. But the most perfect water clocks were, long before the latter period, furnished with wheels, so that the only improvement was the substitution of a solid body to act as a moving weight instead of water. The oldest complete clock moved by weights is probably that sent by the sultan of Turkey to Frederick II. in 1232. In the thirteenth century many of the church steeples in Italy were furnished with clocks moved by weights, which struck the hours. Hele of Nuremberg is supposed to have constructed the first watch in 1500, and to him must also be given the credit of the spring clock. The fusee was probably invented in England about the end of the sixteenth century. But it was not until the middle of the seventeenth century that the pendulum was first applied to clocks by Huyghens.

Trouble For Creditors.

Even the simplest law transactions seem to be beyond the comprehension of some people. An old farmer went into a grocer's shop a short time ago, ordered a sovereign's worth of goods and when they were ready for delivery laid down a five shilling piece in payment thereof.

The shopkeeper called out, "Here, this isn't right!" as the customer started to leave.

"Oh, yes, that's all right," replied the man. "I've got permission from the judge to pay 5 shillings in the pound."

A heated discussion resulted that the man had lately settled an insolvency upon this basis and expected to continue that method indefinitely. When he was shown his mistake he was very indignant and evidently considered himself a much abused man.—London Globe

The Way of the World.

"When we were poor," remarked the prosperous man reflectively, "we looked forward to the time when we could have a summer home."

"Well?"

"Well, when we got rich enough to have one we didn't like going to the same place every summer because it was monotonous, and we looked forward to the time when we could have another for variety."

"Well?"

"Well, we got another, and then we began to long for a 'vinter place,' so that we wouldn't have to be so much in the big house in the city."

"Well?"

"Well, we've got them all now."

"And are you happy?"

The Herring.

A peculiar feature in the herring trade is that an exceptionally large catch during one season has no effect whatever upon the next year's supply; also, large as is man's consumption of herrings, naturalists say the number killed by fishermen is quite insignificant as compared with the quantity destroyed every year by sharks, porpoises, eel, dordfish, flug and other fish, each of which must have its daily meal of from one to two score herrings, to say nothing of the sea birds, which practically live on surface feeding fishes. Herrings are not at all a modern article of diet. A vast commerce in them was carried out in north-west Europe all through the dark and middle ages. The herring's chief food consists of minute organisms, which it strains from the water by its gills, but it also eats worms and at certain seasons its own young, sprats and sand eels.—Pittsburg Weekly

Chapel in a Bell.

The largest bell ever made was cast in Moscow, Russia, in 1733. Its weight was 220 tons. It was a great deal too heavy to be used as a bell, so a hole was made in it to serve as a door and the interior was used as a chapel.

AXIOMS FOR ROAD BUILDERS

Ten Rules For Communities Planning Improvement.

NEGLECTED IN PRACTICE.

Specialists Use as a General Proposition the Abolition of Any Form of Labor Tax For the Upkeep of Roads. Cash Produces Better Results—All Share in Benefits.

(Prepared by the United States department of agriculture.)

For any community that is planning the improvement of its roads there are ten fundamental axioms which the United States department of agriculture declares to be self evident.

First.—That all who share in the benefits of road improvement should share proportionately in the burdens.

Second.—That the degree of improvement should be proportionate to the traffic importance of the road improved.

Third.—That the rate of payment or the rate of accumulation of the sinking fund on any public debt contracted for road improvement should approximately equal the deterioration of the improvement.

Fourth.—That road building and maintenance comprise work requiring special qualifications.

Fifth.—That responsibilities should be definite as to persons.

Sixth.—That continuous employment is more conducive to efficient service than intermittent and temporary employment.

Seventh.—That the specialists who direct road work should be appointed instead of elected, and that they should hold office during efficiency instead of for a fixed term.

Eighth.—That no road is wholly permanent and that it requires continuous upkeep, for which financial and supervisory provisions must be made.

Ninth.—That cash is a much more satisfactory form of tax than labor.

Tenth.—That all agencies at the disposal of the state, capable of use in works of public improvement, should be so used rather than in such commercial production as would conflict with private enterprises.

The first axiom means, among other things, that the country road is a matter of importance to others besides those who live on it or travel over it. It takes the products of the farms to the city and the products of the city factories to the farms.

The second axiom, that the degree of the improvement should be proportionate to the traffic importance of the road, if strictly observed, would do away with one of the most fertile sources of waste and extravagance in road improvement.

If the third axiom is rigidly observed there will be no danger of the community being left with a bonded indebtedness for which there is no improvement to show in return. It must be remembered, however, that, although no road as a whole is permanent, certain features of it such as the location and grading, are so.

The fourth, fifth, sixth and seventh axioms strike at the notion which used to be more prevalent than it is now, that road building is merely a matter of putting a certain number of people to work for a certain length of time.

For similar reasons specialists now strongly urge as a general proposition the abolition of any form of labor tax for the upkeep of roads. The equivalent in cash will produce much better results for the reason that experienced men can find steady employment by being put to work in the places where they are most needed.

The final axiom, that all agencies at the disposal of the state should be used as far as possible for public improvement instead of commercial production, refers, of course, to convict labor upon the road. Under the guidance of skilled men there is no reason why this could not be done satisfactorily. The axiom, however, goes farther than this, for it handles the utilization of various other agencies that have nothing to do with the state prisons—the state geological, for example, the state bureau of statistics and agriculture and the state civil service commission.

LISTEN, WAGE-EARNERS.

Students of statistics tell us that the number of wage-earners employed in the liquor industry is 62,920; in the bread and clothing industry, 492,655.

Wages paid in the liquor industry are $45,252,000; in the bread and clothing industry, $24,196,000.

Cost of raw materials for intoxicating liquor is $139,199,000; for bread and clothing, $744,337,000.

The people of the United States spend more than $2,000,000,000 annually for liquor. It requires eight times as many men to sell bread and clothing as it does to sell the same money value of beer and whisky.

FEARS OF LIQUOR DEALERS.

Quite recently the New York State Wholesale Liquor Dealers' association put their fears into concrete form in the declaration that "the events of the last 12 months have created a situation more grave than has ever before confronted our trade. Formerly we were called upon to oppose town and county option. Today we must combat state and nationwide prohibition. Originally our opponents were few and scattered. Today they are many and united."

VEGETABLES FOR THANKSGIVING

DINNER MENU

Celery Soup.
Roast Chicken. Baked Potatoes.
Mashed Potatoes. Baked Onions.
Pumpkin Pie.
Coffee.

WITH the Thanksgiving turkey most of the autumn vegetables may be used satisfactorily. Onions are usually served; so, too, is celery in the form of soup.

What to Do with Onions:
Baked Onions—Peel carrots of rich, red color, wash and scrape them and cut them in slices. Put the slices through a chopping machine, sewed to "course." Then roll the carrots on a flat surface, but not mashed. Drain them and put them in a double boiler with melted butter, pepper, salt and a little very finely minced parsley.

A Delicious Viand.
Eggplant Fritters.—Peel and cut into quarters a small eggplant. Put it on the stove in a saucepan of boiling salted water, to which has been added a little vinegar. In about ten minutes it will be tender. Transfer it to a dish. When cool enough put it through the food chopper or mash it very fine with the potato masher. Put into the mixing bowl, add to it one well beaten egg, half a cupful each of milk and sifted flour, a teaspoonful of softened butter and a few grains of salt and pepper. Cool and serve as fritters.

Indispensable on Thanksgiving.
Baked Onions.—First remove the outside skin of round, moderately large onions and boil them in slightly salted water until they are tender. Then drain them thoroughly and arrange them neatly in a buttered baking dish. Cover them with creamed sauce—that is to say, pour two or three tablespoonfuls of it over each onion, and then surround them with buttered bread crumbs. Sprinkle a little grated dry Parmesan cheese over them and brown them in a hot oven.

To Hold Salad.
Tomato Baskets.—Tomato baskets may be used for holding vegetable salad, chicken, shrimp, cold beans, asparagus tips, shredded celery, cucumbers, cut in cubes; sliced peppers, whatever, in fact, you may select. Choose firm, smooth tomatoes, not too large and no more than one size as possible. Dip for half a minute in boiling water; then skin and set in the ice box to cool. Cut a generous slice from the top of each, scoop out the pulp and seeds. Dress the cavity with salt, pepper, oil and vinegar; then fill with the salad, seasoned with French dressing or mayonnaise. Handles of watercress may be attached to these ornamental baskets, and they may have a setting of lettuce.

Collaboration For a Picture Play

It Leads to Something More Real Than Photographs

By F. A. MITCHEL

"Oh, Mr. Fielding, I'm so glad you have come!"

"And why, may I ask, are you glad that I have come?" The gentleman's eyes lighted with pride and pleasure.

"Because I have use for you. You're just the person in all the world I have wished for this morning."

Mr. Fielding's countenance fell. But Miss Meriwether was so eager, so vivacious, so evidently absorbed in a dominant idea, that at heart he was not troubled. Nevertheless he said half reproachfully:

"I am disappointed. I hoped your pleasure in my coming was disinterested."

"Don't be silly. I have received an important proposition."

"Show me the man that I may kill him."

"You mean think him. I anticipate no end of pleasure from the opportunity he has given me."

"And I no end of pain."

"There you go again. Now listen to me. It has been proposed to us—myself and you—to make a picture play, the performers if we like, our house and grounds to be used for the scenes. Now you know why I am so glad you have come. It is because you are a literary man and can make the scenario."

"You mean an apology for a scenario. Well, I'll do the best I can for you—that is, I'll help you to construct the scenario. With such a palatial house and grounds, we must make it a high grade society play. I must look up a theme."

"I can't wait for you to look up a theme. I wish to begin right off."

"Suppose we take for our motif a runaway match?"

"The very thing!"

"It's not new, but picture plays are more dependent upon the scenery, the attractiveness of the actors and actresses and all that than the novelty of the theme. With this residence, grounds and I presume, your own sweet self for the heroine, any sort of play must be a success."

"Just think—to be a heroine!" And she clapped her hands gleefully.

"To begin," continued Mr. Fielding, "you, being the leading lady—"

"You mean the heroine."

"You being the heroine, we'll call you Sophia Waterman."

"My favorite name for a heroine is Constance Multivers."

"Very well, you are Constance Multivers. In love with—whom shall we have you in love with?"

"Do you mean really in love with or only for the play?"

"For the play, of course."

"You know so much more about stage matters than any of the rest of us that I think you had better take the part yourself."

This was said humbly and with eyes bent on the floor.

"We will not, of course, use our own names. I must have another. How would French Rogers do?"

"It wouldn't do at all. I like Howard Mortimer much better."

"Howard Mortimer it is. Howard Mortimer, being in love with Constance Multivers and her father being a grim curmudgeon—"

"Is it necessary to make papa that?"

"Oh, no. He may simply wish for you to marry a prominent politician who, though younger than himself, is his intimate friend."

Miss Meriwether looked up at Mr. Fielding with an expression he understood, though another would not have.

"And who is to play that part?" she asked, after a long pause.

"The gentleman him—I mean Mr. Cogswell, perhaps, might—"

"Mr. Cogswell would do no such thing—that is, if the heroine is to marry Howard Mortimer."

"I never thought of that. We must find some one else."

"Perhaps I can persuade Mr. Cogswell to take the part."

"And give place to Mortimer at the end of the play?"

"I don't know. Is that necessary?"

Mr. Fielding smiled.

"Why couldn't that be left till later?" asked Miss Meriwether.

"It was not aware," replied Mr. Fielding, with a slight haughtiness, "that a woman who is so deeply in love that she is about to defy her parents by running away with a man would have any doubts as to what man she intends to run away with."

"Mightn't she change her mind at the last minute?"

"That is a feature of realism which would be difficult to work into our play, considering the theme. It would be incongruous."

"I suppose we will have to leave Mr. Cogswell out."

"Whom would you put in his place?"

"Mack Gregory would play the part well if he could be induced to assume it."

Mr. Fielding frowned. In Mr. Gregory he recognized another of Miss Meriwether's admirers. He changed his tactics.

"Mr. Gregory," he said, "has not the personnel for any prominent part. He is too dumpy."

"Mack is not dumpy at all," replied Miss Meriwether; "he is very symmetrical."

"His nose would not photograph well. It's too long. You see, in photographing an object the nearer it is to the camera the larger it is. Gregory's nose photographed facing the camera would look like an elephant's trunk."

"Do you really think so?"

"I know it."

"Who else is there we can get for the part?"

"It seems to me that if the heroine doesn't know her own mind we'd better put off making the scenario till she finds out which way the wind blows."

"Is she a weathercock?" reproachedfully.

"She may be what she likes in real life. When she goes on the boards she must follow the dramatic laws."

"What are the dramatic laws?"

"The one that especially pertains to this theme is that the leading lady must be desperately in love with the leading gentleman."

"Doesn't the leading gentleman have to be desperately in love with the leading lady too?"

"Certainly, but I can't see how he can act his part to advantage if he thinks she doesn't know whether she loves him or not. Besides, her uncertainty would spoil the play. At the last minute, when the audience is expecting to see her run out of the door, fit along the piazza to the portico, where, to run away with the leading gentleman, she might be descending a ladder at the back window to make with the villain. That would make a pretty mess of it."

"How ridiculous!"

"I should think so."

"Why," she asked after a pause, "couldn't the heroine be photographed first running along the piazza to get into a car with the hero and then descending a ladder from a back window to run away with his rival? Then during the performance she could make up her mind which suitor she wanted and the scene to correspond with her decision could be used. When I read a story or see a play I never like to know which way it's going to turn out. It seems to me our play would be much more interesting my way than the other way. The audience wouldn't know who was going to win."

Mr. Fielding's eyes were bent on Miss Meriwether's face with ill concealed wonder while she pronounced this suggestion. When she had finished she looked up at him and, noting his expression, asked him what caused it.

"Wonder that such a marvellous advance in the dramatic art should have remained hidden from dramatists for so many centuries. Who would have thought that a girl of today should have made such a discovery?"

"Are you signed as a dramatist?"

"Permit me to withdraw from collaborating with one whose ideas are so far above mine that I could never reach them and would therefore never be in accord with them."

He rose, shook down his trousers and gave his coat a hitch, as if to re-dress.

"Sit down," said Miss Meriwether. "I don't think you quite understand me. Perhaps it would be better for one of these gentlemen whom I have suggested to take the part of a rival."

"A villain?"

"What you like, rival or villain. Perhaps, we can agree better if Mr. Cogswell, for instance, should take the leading part and you take the part of the villain."

"If you mean the rival, I would say that a real rival might be inspired to act the part better than one who does not consider himself worthy to—"

"To what?"

"Unless the heroine's shoes."

A prolonged silence.

"It seems to me," said Miss Meriwether, "that we have spent a lot of time without getting anywhere. Suppose we begin. If you are to act the part of my lover it seems to me that you should be getting used to act lover-like toward me. I have noticed that lovers in picture plays give each other real kisses. Must we do that?"

Mr. Fielding brightened up. He assured Miss Meriwether that they must do everything that professional actors and actresses do in picture plays, and he proceeded to practice a lover's bearing toward his ladylove by drawing very near her. Then he took her hand and in a few minutes later stole an arm around her dainty waist.

"I wonder if I can have the face to be photographed in this position," said Miss Meriwether doubtfully.

"I think that if we remain awhile in this position you will become so accustomed to it that you will not mind the camera."

The latter portion of the rehearsal came in after he had made real love to her, asked her to be his wife and she had accepted him. The kiss was never better performed in the most artistic photographic production.

As to the collaboration for a picture play, that is in embryo. But so much time is taken up in rehearsing lovers' parts that it is questionable if the scenario will ever be finished. Meanwhile it has got out that a pair of real society lovers are collaborating in the construction of a picture play in which they will take the leading parts themselves, and multitudes are waiting for the opening performance.

But those who know never that the picture play will never be constructed. Some declare that Miss Meriwether had been nagging for some time for Mr. Fielding, who was considered a great catch; that no proposition whatever for a picture play had been made to her, and that she devised the scheme for the purpose of bringing him to terms. At any rate, the announcement of their engagement will soon be made.

HIS BLUFF WAS CALLED.

He Got What He Didn't Expect and Paid a Nice Price For It.

A young woman of smart wit and striking beauty presided at one of the stalls at a Paris charity bazaar.

Among the small crowd which pressed round the fair vender was a young man of much assurance, who gazed upon the girl with freedom and affect to admire the various fancy articles exposed for sale, but bought nothing.

"What will you please to buy?" asked mademoiselle, with an exquisite smile.

"Oh," replied the young dandy, with a languishing look, "what I most wish to buy is unhappily not for sale."

"Tell me what you wish," she responded.

"Oh, no; I dare not declare my wishes."

"Nevertheless let me know what you wish to buy," persisted the fair saleswoman.

"Well, then, since you demand it, I should like a ringlet of your glossy black hair."

She manifested no embarrassment at the bold request, but with a pair of scissors immediately clipped off one of her beautiful locks and handed it to the astonished youth, remarking that the price was only 500 francs.

Her audacious admirer was thunder-struck with the demand, but dared not demur, as by this time a group had collected and were listening to the conversation. So he took the hair, paid over the money and left the hall.

—Craze.

Craze stands even before Warsaw in the minds of Polish patriots. Not only was it once the capital of free Poland, with a cathedral equivalent to Westminster Abbey, wherein sleep the generations of Polish kings and heroes, but it possesses the most striking patriotic memorial in the world. This is the Kosciuszkoberg, a mound, 300 feet high, erected to the memory of Kosciuszko, and formed of earth from every battlefield of Poland. In the construction of that memorial Polish nobles, statesmen and peasants toiled side by side.—London Spectator.

—Enjoyment.

A certain rich woman, having run her eye over the latest report of the bureau of statistics touching food stuffs, grew very little all at once.

"Why shouldn't I enjoy life when so few can really afford it?" she exclaimed glowingly.—Puck.

—Lawmaking.

I seldom make a law for me. It is usually you I am trying to do something or preventing from doing something else. And when I do make a law for me I feel very free in violation of it if occasion seems to require it.

ESKIMOS AS TRADERS.

Value Counts as Nothing if They See Anything They Want.

Among the Eskimos of the Bering sea region there is no fixed value for whalebone, furs or anything they may have to trade. If one of them has anything of value he will keep it until some white man appears with something that appeals to his eye. And the money value of what may take him does not make any difference to him. If he has a trinket that may be worth a dollar and some one offers to give him for it something that is worth a thousand dollars, but of which he has no need, he will refuse to trade. But he will give anything he possesses for what he really wants.

An Eskimo of St. Lawrence Island in Bering sea, made a catch one sea son of a big bowhead whale. The head of baleen was worth between $10,000 and $15,000. He knew the approximate value of the head, but he held on to it with no apparent desire to trade. One day a trader appeared with a small gasoline launch, valued at perhaps $200 or $300. The sight of that so took the native that he straight way traded his head of bone for it.

Far out in the strait one day, he ran out of gasoline. He abandoned the launch for the canoe he was towing and paddled back to the island. But he did not regret his trade. He was satisfied and ready to try for another whale. —Yonah's Companion.

Winning a Violin

The way M. Yanyo, the great violinist, became the owner of a Guarneri violin dated 1712 was thus quaintly told by himself:

"The Guarneri was bought in Paris by a pupil of mine, a charming young woman. I carried her the violin and fate gave it to me. I touch this pupil and by and by I meet her sister, a most lovely young woman, with whom I fall in love straightway and marry. Soon I go to my sister-in-law, who was my pupil, and say to her:

"It is time you stop fooling with a violin. You will never learn how to play it. I take the liberty of a big brother, but she do not like it for long time. At last she succumbed to my experience and wisdom, and she stops playing. Then I say grandiloquently: "I will take the Guarnerius, 1742 I take it, and that is how the violin came into the possession of Yanyo."

ROAD BEE DAY PROCLAMATION

June 10th and 11th to be Generally Observed Throughout State.

Governor Ferris Urges People to Place Roads in Safe and Passable Condition.

On June 4th and 5th, 1914, the first annual road bee was observed in Michigan. Unfortunately it rained very hard quite generally over the state on one of these days, but other days were appointed by the different road associations to finish the work so well begun. On the whole, much good resulted to the roads of the state and in many localities the community interest in the common roads was greatly revived.

The amount of money raised by direct taxation and annually expended on the rural highways of the state is rapidly increasing. In 1901 the highway taxes were less than two and a half million dollars, while in 1914 the highway taxes had increased to $6,849,745.74. This does not take into account bond issues and private donations which would increase this sum to at least seven and one-half millions of dollars, but it does represent an annual increase of more than $300,000 in the road taxes of Michigan. The greatest significance, however, attaches to the fact that more than two-thirds of this money was raised by direct vote of the farmers at the annual town meetings and was expended on the local highways under township supervision. These figures speak volumes for the growing interest in better roads.

While the state has aided in the building of some 3,500 miles of well constructed highways, and is planning to extend this work very rapidly in the future, the common dirt roads always will constitute the greater portion of our road mileage, and they need constant attention to keep them even in such "reasonably safe and passable condition" as highway laws of Michigan require.

Knowing that the various good roads associations, as well as the majority of people in Michigan, are anxious to extend the work of road improvement so as to include all of our road mileage, and, believing that specially appointed road days are a great stimulus to the work, I, Woodbridge N. Ferris, do ask that people of the State of Michigan set apart Thursday and Friday, June 10th and 11th, as "Road Bee Days," and, so far as possible, turn out and work under such competent supervision as may be available on the highways of the state in such manner as shall be most conducive to their betterment.

Woodbridge N. Ferris, Governor.

Coleman C. Vaughn, Sec. of State.

LIKE SIAMESE TWINS

Gaudalope and Josephine Are Daughters of Spanish Parents—Now at Rochester, Minn.

Gaudalope and Josephine, two pretty, smiling and bright-appearing little girls, daughters of Spanish parents, are as absolutely inseparable a pair as were the world-renowned Siamese twins of unforgettable fame. They have never been parted since the day of their birth, two and a half years ago, but it is now hoped to separate them through the agency of the doctors in Rochester, where they were accompanied by their parents.

The children were born in Havana, and are connected by a binding connection of flesh about 13 inches in circumference, at almost the center of their fore stomach. The twins can walk forward with ease, each putting an arm around the other's waist. The band of flesh is elastic enough to permit them to change sides as they walk. One of the children can lie on the edge of a bed and the other can stand beside it, their bodies making an X so resilient is the connection.

All their body functions seem to be independent, and the medicine given to one has no effect upon the other. One child may be laughing and the other crying at the same time. The babies look much alike and appear very fond of each other, and at times hug and kiss each other in a lovingly way, but when they "fall out," there is a merry scrap at close quarters. At birth they weighed twelve pounds, and at present weigh 45 pounds.—Stillwater Gazette.

MARRIED AT ST. MARY'S CHURCH

Miss Edith Nowland and John Zeidler United in Holy Wedlock.

Reception Held in Evening at Farm Home of the Bride's Parents.

St. Mary's church was the scene of a pretty wedding last Thursday morning at 9 o'clock, when Miss Edith Nowland of Marion township and Mr. John Zeidler of this city were united in holy wedlock by Rev. Fr. Alfred Tritz.

The bride was dressed in white embroidered net over silk and wore a veil of finest net, held by a wreath of white rose buds. She carried a bouquet of roses and white carnations. Miss Clara Nowland, sister of the bride, acted as bridesmaid. She wore white embroidered organdie and carried a bouquet of pink carnations. Frank Zeidler, brother of the groom, acted as best man.

Following the wedding ceremony, an elaborate wedding dinner was served to about seventy-five guests at the home of the bride and groom.

In the evening a reception was held at the farm home of the bride's parents, Mr. and Mrs. Ben Nowland, at which time the newly-weds received many useful and valuable gifts. One of the most pleasing features of the event was that the reception was held on the 25th wedding anniversary of the bride's parents.

Out of town guests were Mr. and Mrs. Ira Nowland and son Bennie, and Mrs. Thomas of Petoskey; W. H. Whitford of Blaine, Washington, grandfather of the bride; Mrs. Jos. D. Haney of Lansing, sister of the groom; Mr. and Mrs. J. J. Votruba and family of East Jordan, and Miss Mina Stewart of Ellsworth.

The happy young couple will start housekeeping at their home in the western part of the city.

A Correction.

In the write up of the High School graduation exercises, it was stated that commencement exercises would be held Friday night at the Methodist church. This is an error. Instead of being held at the church as stated in the article, the exercises will be held in the Charlevoix Theatre. Keep this in mind—Friday night's doings in school exercises are to be at the theatre.

DEATH OF WILLARD HOWE RESULT OF INJURY IN AUTO ACCIDENT

Was on Way Home Sunday Night With Companion, After Attending Graduation Exercises, When Buggy Was Struck by Automobile Driven by James Wyers—Occupants of Car Unhurt.

The most serious automobile accident of this season, and the first fatal accident occurred Sunday night about 10:30, when a rig driven by Willard Howe and Guy Sneathen, both well-known young men of Hayes township, was run into by an automobile driven by James Wyers of this city.

Mr. Howe and his companion, Guy Sneathen, had been to this city attending the graduation services held at the Methodist church, and were on their way home. They were on the Petoskey road between the farm homes of George Burns and Ernest Peaslee, about opposite a big maple tree located by the side of the road, when the accident happened. Wyers, about two hours previously, had driven to the farm home of Chester Blanchard, and was on his way to Charlevoix.

The automobile struck the buggy on the right side near the front wheel, smashing the wheel and the crossbar, the force of the impact tearing the buggy loose from the horse and throwing both occupants forward onto the ground. The car swerved to the left and continued its course across the road, into the ditch, until it collided with a fence post, which was broken off.

Howe and Sneathen picked themselves up, apparently unhurt, and assisted the occupants of the car to regain the road, none of whom were injured. Upon examination, the car was found to be damaged to such an extent that it was impossible to drive it to Charlevoix, and the occupants, Wyers as driver, two young ladies by the name of Hemlock, and Mrs. Chester Blanchard, walked to Charlevoix.

The two young men in the rig went to the home of George Burns, where they borrowed a buggy, to which they hitched their horse, and continued their way to the home of Mr. Howe. After reaching home the boys stabled the horse, and Sneathen walked to his home, some distance from the Howe farm.

While driving to his home, after the accident had occurred, Willard complained of severe pains in his chest, and that it hurt him when he coughed. However, he made light of the matter, although repeatedly asked by his companion as to his condition.

After the horse had been stabled, and Sneathen had gone to his home, Willard, thinking he had forgotten to halt the horse, took a lantern and went to the barn. This occurred about 12:30. About two o'clock members of the family were disturbed by the cattle, and one of them arose and went to the barn. After taking care of the cattle, he noticed a light in the horse barn, and upon entering, found the lantern on the barn floor by the side of the horse, and the body of Willard Howe lying about six feet back of the animal. Examination of the body showed that death had occurred some time before. The remains were carried to the house and a physician summoned, and upon examination, it was found that being thrown from the buggy when the accident happened had ruptured a blood vessel, and his continued activity afterward had caused a hemorrhage, terminating in death.

Willard Howe was a son of Philip Howe a well-known resident of Hayes township. He was 24 years of age, a graduate of the C. H. S. and Normal class of 1914. During the past school year he had taught near Copemish, and had been home less than ten days, having completed his school year. He was a conscientious, clean, hard working young man, and was just in the beginning of a prosperous career. He had been engaged as a teacher for the coming year, and was very successful and well liked in his line of work.

His record while a student in the school here and during his young manhood, was above reproach and his death is greatly regretted by a large circle of acquaintanceship.

Funeral services were held from the home Wednesday afternoon at 1:30, Rev. Quinton Walker, officiating. Interment in the Undine cemetery. The funeral was largely attended, showing in a marked degree the high esteem in which he was held.

Tuesday afternoon Coroner Wilkinson impaneled a jury, and with Prosecuting Attorney Lewis and Sheriff Novak viewed the scene of the accident. In the evening at the court house witnesses were examined and the accident thoroughly probed. Testimony from occupants of the car was quite conflicting. Wyers testified that he was running at a slow speed on account of the dense fog, and did not see the rig until he crashed into it. The testimony of Guy Sneathen showed that the occupants of the buggy saw the lights of the car, but could not get out of its way in time to avoid a collision, on account of the speed they were driving. After hearing considerable testimony, the jury rendered a verdict that the death of Willard Howe was the direct result of an injury received in the collision between the rig and the car.

It is not known whether the case will be further prosecuted or not.

SPEND DAY AT SEQUENOTA

Mrs. Ada M. Shockey Entertains Congregation Aid Society.

The Congregational Ladies' Aid Society are indebted to Mrs. Ada M. Shockey for a delightful day spent at her Sequenota cottage, Wednesday, June 2nd, and to members of the society who afforded the pleasant transportation by autos.

It was one of those very attractive, "do as you please," days, sitting on the ground enjoying the beautiful view down Pine Lake, wandering through woodland, or catching a fine mess of fish, as some of the ladies succeeded in doing. The generous hospitality, the homeliness of that pot-luck dinner, and the appetites in waiting, will indeed dwell in memory for many a day.

Lighting Struck Wires.

Sunday afternoon's heavy downpour of rain, accompanied by severe thunder and lightning, did considerable damage to Charlevoix and vicinity. Lightning struck the telephone wires near the Beach Hotel, running across the road to the Elston cottage, burning out all the lights in the house and setting it afire where the wires entered the house. A pall of water put out the fire. Manu Solomon had a force of men at work Monday repairing the damage done to the telephone wires.

VACATION WORK

Teachers and Students May Obtain Work on Farms During Summer.

By the direction of the Secretary of Labor, an investigation is being made to determine as far as possible the number of extra help needed in agricultural sections and to ascertain where the supply of workers can be found to meet the demand. Inasmuch as the vacation period of the great majority of schools occur at a time of greatest need for agricultural help, it is suggested that there may be teachers and students who desire employment during vacations, or at any time of the year when they desire to engage in such pursuits for practical experience and wages. The educational departments of the various states have been requested to circulate this information as extensively as possible. Students who are dependent on their earnings to support and educate themselves may find this of assistance. All who desire work should apply by mail to the Division of Information, Bureau of Immigration, U. S. Department of Labor, Washington, D. C., for the necessary blanks upon which to make application. Requests will receive prompt attention and the service is free.

SHIP A-1 STOCK

Effort Being Made to Standardize all Cherries When Shipped.

For the first time in the history of Northwestern Michigan an effort is being made to standardize the cherry pack. Two grades, XXX and XX, have been adopted by the Grand Traverse Fruit & Produce Exchange and all growers of cherries in this part of the state are being urged to pack their fruit according to the new rules.

The XXX grade calls for table packed cherries, of one variety, preferably clipped stock, of good size, perfect shape, fully colored for the variety, and absolutely free from all defects such as curculio sting, rot, etc.

The XX grade calls for cherries that are either table or picker pack, of one variety, preferably clipped stock, of good size and free from rot.

High grade strictly fancy cherries will be marketed in special packages whenever conditions warrant.

All cherries must have stems of medium length. All packages must be free from sticks, leaves, stones, etc., and all packages must be full and of standard weight for variety.

The cherries shipped by the Fruit Exchange will be inspected and carry the name of the Exchange.

All cherry growers, in the entire region, however, are urged to adopt the packing rules and to follow them with rigorous fidelity in the hopes of getting the cherry growing industry on a sound business basis in the early future. As soon as the fruit industry is as well organized as the fruit industry of the Pacific coast states, the amount of wealth coming into this section annually will be greatly increased and those who have made heavy investments in cherry orchards will get interest on their investments.

SAVE YOUR RATS; WORTH FIVE CENTS

Recently Passed Penney Rat Bill Soon to Become Effective.

Annual Loss Each Year from Pests Runs into the Thousands—How to Trap Them.

Few bills passed by the legislature at its recent session have attracted more attention than that pushed through by Representative Harvey Penney of Saginaw. The bill has been the subject of much ridicule, both in the legislature and other quarters, yet the criticism has come from people who do not realize the enormous economic loss caused each year by the immense army of useless rodents, nor of their menace to health as carriers of disease germs.

A private bounty on rats has long been paid by various business houses in Saginaw and elsewhere, and one town in the upper peninsula has for some time been paying 25 cents per head on rats.

The new law, effective 90 days after the adjournment of the legislature, provides a bounty of five cents per head on rats. This is paid on presentation of the heads to the city clerk or other designated receiver.

It is reported that the farmers are waking up to the fact that they can turn their useless rats into cash. It is reported that one ingenious farmer of Saginaw county has designed and put into operation an ingenious rat destroyer and preservative that will last him a neat sum.

The farmer's plan is to use a tight barrel about half filled with a formaldehyde solution. The rats are enticed out over the solution onto a tipping platform. Beyond the platform is attached to the opposite side of the inside of the barrel a tempting chunk of cheese. Mr. Rat scents the delicacy, starts out over the platform for it and is suddenly precipitated into the formaldehyde solution. He at once loses his interest in the cheese and yearns for liberty but cannot climb out and soon drowns. The solution not only drowns Mr. Rat but preserves his body so that it will be negotiable for a nickel when the date at which the law becomes effective comes round. Thus the farmer not only rid his place of rats but makes them of commercial value.

N. B.—Formaldehyde can be obtained for a small sum at any drug store and any old tight barrel that will hold water can be used.

Any ingenious small boy can install the tipping platform and the chunk of cheese.

SOLODIERS TO MEET

Annual Reunion Will Begin June 15 on Fair Grounds at Traverse City.

At a meeting of the executive committee of the Grand Traverse Soldiers' and Sailors' Association held at Traverse City last week, plans were completed for holding the annual reunion in that city on the fair grounds, commencing Tuesday, June 15, and lasting through Wednesday, Thursday and Friday.

Different committees were appointed who will carry out in detail the program as arranged. The plans for the housing of the soldiers are practically the same as last year. Prominent speakers have signified their intention of being at the meeting, including Hon. J. C. McLaughlin, congressman from the Ninth district; Judge F. H. Mayne, E. W. Thompson, deputy great commander of the Macabees and others.

Thursday afternoon there will be one of the biggest sham battles ever fought between the Spanish war veterans and the Naval Reserves. These annual gatherings are looked forward to with great anticipation by the civil war survivors, and for that reason all who possibly can are urged to attend.

Notice.

The undersigned merchants of this city, believing that clerks in retail stores should have working hours more in conformity with other lines of work, will close our places of business at 6 p. m. on Tuesday and Thursday evenings. ZUDORA In the Twenty Million Dollar Mystery

By HAROLD MACGRATH

Copyright, 1914 and 1915, by Harold MacGrath

SYNOPSIS.

Zudora is left an orphan at an early age. Her father is killed in a gold mine. Zudora and her fortune from the mine, which grows to be worth $20,000,000, are left in the guardianship of Frank Keene, Zudora's mother's brother, who has set himself up as a Hindu mystic and is known as Hassam Ali. He decides that Zudora must die before she can have a chance to come into possession of her money, so that it may be left to him, the next of kin. Hassam Ali sees an obstacle in the way of his plan in the person of John Storm, a young lawyer, for whom Zudora has taken a fancy, and he commands the girl to put the man out of her mind. Zudora insists that if she cannot marry Storm she will marry no one.

"Well, well," says Hassam Ali, "solve my next twenty cases and you can marry him; fail in a single case and you must renounce him."

Zudora unravels a mystery and wins her first case—a case in which John Storm is saved from being convicted of a murder instigated by Hassam Ali himself.

Zudora and Hassam Ali visit Nabok Shan's house, where she overcomes a very one whenever Nabok attempts to marry a princess. Storm, seeking Zudora, is made a prisoner. Zudora follows Nabok Shan, restores the princess to her original lover and saves Storm from death.

A maker of diamonds tells Hassam Ali his secret. Storm informs Zudora that his life is being attempted frequently by Hassam Ali. Storm is arrested for stealing the diamond maker's gems, but Zudora discovers the real thieves—a pair of mice.

The negro help employed on Storm's father's farm are feeling because a great skeleton hand appears at night upon a hill near by. Storm is baffled in his investigation, but Zudora learns that her uncle has employed Jimmy Bolton, a half-witted man, thus to annoy Storm's parents. Zudora finds Bolton operating a big magic lantern and is attacked by him. Storm appears and saves her.

Hassam Ali asks Zudora to find a gem lost by two mysterious old men. Zudora gets a photograph of the gem and it burns in her hand. An old house is mined by Hassam Ali and the old men. Storm and Zudora are lured there and narrowly escape destruction when the house blows up. John McWinter, endeavoring to trap and kill George Smith, is killed himself, and Smith is charged with murder. Hassam Ali conspires to have John Storm meet the same fate as McWinter, and he and Storm are overcome by powerful fumes. Zudora saves them, proves that McWinter's own dog trapped and killed him and saves Smith from a band of lynchers.

An inventor blows up a submarine with a powerful heat ray which he sends through water. Hassam Ali sends Zudora to a photographer directly beneath the inventor's laboratory and orders the inventor to kill her. Zudora gets a warning, and her life is saved. The heat ray machine is destroyed, and the photographer, after a quarrel with Hassam Ali, is found dead in the river.

We thank prevents Zudora's elopement with John Storm by hypnotizing her, and he and Hassam Ali attempt to smuggle her out of the country. This plot is frustrated by Storm. Hassam Ali's double, false in love with Zudora, Baird and Mme. Du Val kidnap Zudora and the Van Wick child. Storm rescues them, and Hassam Ali dies.

With Hassam Ali dead Zudora is released of her pledge to solve twenty cases. She confronts, however, the greatest mystery of all, which is the mystery of her own life, and the ambition to secure the vast fortune of $20,000,000 left to her. This great photo serial is being shown in the leading moving picture theaters by the Thanhouser Film Corporation. Among those participating are Marguerita Shaw, Mary Elizabeth Forbes, James Cruze, in the new role of reporter-hero, Sidney Tracey and Frank Farrington.

On looking through her uncle's papers Zudora finds that her father left her an interest in a diamond mine, and Storm and Baird both lend assistance in trying to regain for her possession of this estate which is being appropriated by a rogue under the leadership of Mme. Du Val. They plan to frighten Zudora so that she will run away. Failing, they kidnap Zudora and Howard, the mine superintendent, and put them in a private insane asylum. Howard dies, but Zudora, nearly finished, is rescued by Storm and his friends. Detective Hunt and Baird find the Zudora gold mine.

Mrs. Copeland's jewels are stolen, but recovered through the cleverness of Hunt and Baird. They investigate the mysteries of Mme. Du Val's house. A map of a mine is stolen from Zudora, who later is kidnapped and held prisoner. Storm rescues her, but the thieves escape with the diamonds.

CHAPTER XIX.

The Prisoner in the Pilothouse.

"CAN we make them?" asked Baird of Hunt, as their motorboat sped up the river in pursuit of the smugglers.

"I can't tell just yet. Think of them yanking that water bottle out of my hand! I'll bet it had a hundred gems inside. Well, well; that's what comes by being overconfident. Hey, engineer, what speed are we making?"

"About eighteen miles."

"Is that a higher powered boat than ours?"

"Don't know nothing about her, sir," "She's pulling away from us slight by," growled Baird.

"But you can take it from me, mister, that she won't pull so far away that we can't tell where and when she's going to land. I got plenty of oil," said the engineer.

"Well, keep her right where she is and duck for shore when they do," commanded Hunt.

"They're making for the Jersey shore a few miles. I guess she goes about twenty-three. It'll take her an hour to lose us entirely."

"Since we can't overhaul her, keeping her in sight is the next best thing," replied Hunt. "Think of filling a water bottle with diamonds and accidentally dropping it overboard into the hands of a fish-dog!"

"Squid head that man has! He's got. And they'd have got away with it completely but for the stumbling on to that code message on our part? They were sitting on a bed. I can just see that man's face. And, damn it, I know there are diamonds in that bag and yet I couldn't prove it in court. They'll probably take them all out before we can land on them. I wish you'd kick me when we get ashore. Why didn't I draw my revolver and cover them while I picked up the bag?"

"Search me," said Baird, smiling. "Now, don't get a grouse before dinner. At least we got Zudora out of their clutches, and that's worth a bag of diamonds any day in the week."

"And poor Storm went to the same fate and never smelled a rat. Well, if they get her again I'll give the job to you. I've wanted those two enough about keeping their eyes open. She and Mme. Du Val were both made prisoners, but evidently Madame escaped days ago. Peculiar, huh?"

"Could you arrest her?"

"Not on this deal. Oh, they're slippery citizens. They don't take the turnips out of the pot, until they are cooked. Still gaining on us. Well, we'll have to take our chances on land. I'll do the work. You stay by the boat. I don't propose to walk back to Jersey City. We wouldn't get into New York until midnight. Ha! There they go, Jersey shore it is, engineers. If you go across lots you can cut down a bit of their gain."

In the other boat they seemed to be enjoying the voyage.

"Light from under Hunt's nose. That's what pleases me," said Bruce.

Storm readily discovered her identity. What did the woman want? She wanted advice about some papers. When she brought them out of her hand bag Storm felt a flurry of excitement. But they were only some insurance papers regarding Madame's property. Storm managed to read them over carefully. He returned them with the remark that they were perfectly in good order. He named a nominal fee for his investigation. It was paid and Mme. Du Val left the office.

"Well, hang me, if that isn't a funny game. What the dickens can she want? Or was she just getting the lay of the office for some future work?"

As he could not solve the enigma, he went back to his own work. Zudora would be along presently.

On going out of the office Madame had set the latch so that it would close but not lock the door. When she saw Zudora coming in at the entrance of the building she hid herself and followed the girl back upstairs. The typist was having.

Zudora ran into the office, threw her arms around John's neck and hugged him.

"And to think this morning I was a prisoner, wanting to die and be free of it all. Oh, I've gone through so much that I never want to bear the word adventure again."

"And I don't blame you."

Mme. Du Val stole in noiselessly and tiptoed behind the screen.

"Do you believe that Mme. Du Val was really made a prisoner too?"

"Temporarily, yes. But it all looks a bit fishy to me. Here's the postman. Let's see what he brings."

He opened the letters one by one. "Why, here's a letter from that man Marcus Villers, who is managing your mines in Montana."

"Read it."

"I failed in my last effort to deliver to you some valuable papers concerning your late father's estate. I am now sending them by express and trust they will reach you safely. I hope to hear from these papers will show us some light. We meet it, girl."

lurped out and began running toward the spot where he had seen the two men last. Baird occupied himself with the painter. The engineer knelt before his cylinders and hunted for a possible bit of damage.

The man like thought that he might just as well dispose of Baird. In that event the detective would be between two fires and they might be able to put him out of his misery. Baird was in the act of tying the painter when he struck him a violent but fortunately a glancing blow on the head. Baird stumbled and fell, and he drew his knife with murderous intention. But Baird turned in time, caught the wrist and fought savagely for all that his head was ringing like discordant chimes. He succeeded in making his assailant drop the knife; then he stepped back and began to spar. As he stooped to recover the knife Baird caught him fairly on the chin. Baird did not wait to learn whether the man was senseless or not. He took to his heels, confident that Hunt would presently have urgent need of him.

Hunt was a famous runner, and he reached the house on the hill just as Bruce and Gyp entered it.

The two smugglers went directly to the kitchen. Bruce dropped the water bottle on the deal table, unscrewed the top and dumped out the diamonds. Hunt saw this obliquely through the kitchen window. He now wished he'd brought Baird along with him.

And Baird had lost his way. Neither Hunt nor the men he was pursuing were anywhere in sight. Baird swore and began rubbing the side of his head, which ached painfully. Where the deuce had Hunt gone?

Meantime he recovered. Instead of attempting to follow Baird he staggered off to the first telephone he could find and called Radcliffe, who, he was sure, had arrived at Mme. Du Val's by this time. Radcliffe had his hands full of documents, most of them rightfully belonging to Zudora, when the telephone rang.

"It's Ike," he said to Madame. "He says he needs us. Here, put those papers in your hand bag. We'll go right to Storm's office first. You'll know what to say."

Storm, having left Zudora safely at home with Mrs. Ramsey, had returned to his office. He was vastly surprised to see Mme. Du Val enter, but he managed to form his features into graciousness. He was curious to learn what the woman wanted. He dismissed his typist, who, making a pretense of leaving the room, stole behind a screen. Mme. Du Val was veiled heavily, but

It hardly seems possible that any Range could be used this length of time, but the following sworn affidavit of R. T. Mears states that he has used a Majestic Range in his home for this length of time, and that today, as far as he can see, the range is good for many years more of service. Read what he says about the Majestic:

State of Michigan,
County of Charlevoix, ss.

R. T. Mears, being duly sworn, deposes and says that he has used a Majestic Range in his home for the past twelve years. Dependent further swears that during this time he has spent but 75c for repairs on said Majestic Range, and that today the range is in splendid condition and shows but little evidence of its long usage. Dependent further says that during a greater portion of this time he has burned coal in the above mentioned range, and that he has never had to replace any of the parts of the fire box, and that the fire back is, from all that he can see, as good as ever.

R. T. MEARS.

Subscribed to before me this 18th day of May, A. D., 1915.

L. E. BENTON, Notary Public.

My commission expires July 13, 1915.

What better recommendation can a Range be given than that above by Mr. Mears for the Majestic.

Users of the Majestic from all parts of the country give testimony of the same nature. If you want a range that is a fuel saver, easy to operate, one that will LAST, the Majestic is the one to buy.

THE intelligent voters of the country realize that it would be folly to discontinue the study and discussion of other matters of governmental concern merely because a war in Europe has given rise to important diplomatic correspondence. The president of the United States and the members of congress are not chosen primarily to determine foreign policies but to make laws and establish policies for the domestic affairs of the United States. The present administration was not elected upon policies and pledges regarding foreign affairs, but upon certain principles and pledges regarding legislation affecting the people of the United States in their business and governmental interests. Whether the government theories upon which this administration was elected have been the success which the Democratic party promised for them; whether the Democratic administration has given the people an economical and efficient administration, and whether that party has fairly fulfilled its pledges to the people, are live questions for discussion today regardless of any international question that has risen.

The president's emphasis on the word "humanity" in the German note led some people to declare that this was the first time the word had ever been brought to the front in diplomatic exchanges. A Spanish war veteran writes to the St. Louis Globe-Democrat to show the contrary, by calling to mind an expression employed by McKinley just prior to the war in 1896. McKinley declared that "in the name of humanity and civilization," the atrocities in Cuba must come to an end. This veteran points out that a parallel case exists in Mexico, but those in authority in Washington have overlooked many things along with the watchful waiting policy. In the name of humanity and civilization how long will such conditions be allowed to exist at our door.

THE national treasury balance shipped another million dollars during the seven days ending May 22, when the balance in the treasury was $13,864,451.88. On the corresponding date two years ago there was $131,002,994.61 in Uncle Sam's general fund. For the present fiscal year up to May 22, government expenditures have exceeded the receipts to the amount of $123,328,680.93.

DEMOCRATIC newspapers are insisting that Republicans shall not discuss politics while controversies with foreign countries are pending, but they lose no opportunity to give widest publicity to every political speech made by members of the president's cabinet. By what right do Democrats claim the exclusive privilege to talk politics?

BAPTIST CHURCH NOTES

Our choir who went with us furnished splendid music at Burgess Sunday.

A special lecture sermon on Sunday night. Subject "The Pearl of Great Price." Come and bring your friends.

We thoroughly enjoyed Rev. Walker's sermon to the senior class Sunday evening. The one climax that one has but few friends who will never forsake them is so true, and in Christ we find a friend which is absolutely unfailing. What is a truly precious, on the other hand, is well within the resources of the country and would save, not waste, money.

LIVE STOCK HUSBANDRY

STOMACH WORMS IN SHEEP.

Sheep Should Be Treated For These Parasites in Midsummer. Sheep suffer little from tuberculous and other infectious diseases, but they often become infested with certain blood sucking parasites or worms, which have become rather a serious obstacle to those who are interested in raising sheep. The most dreaded of these is the stomach worm, writes W. L. Boyd in the American Agriculturist. This worm is widely distributed and in certain stages of its life it is very resistant to cold or dry weather. The stomach worm reaches maturity and lays eggs in the stomach. The eggs pass out with the intestinal contents and begin hatching within a few days after they are dropped. If climate conditions are favorable. Dry weather or severe cold will destroy the eggs and prevent them from hatching.

The Delaine sheep is a subbreed of the Merino. It is a sheep of large size, strong constitution and compact, symmetrical form, with a heavy fleece of fine Delaine wool. The weight of a mature ewe of this breed should run from 100 to 120 pounds and her fleeces from nine to fourteen pounds of long, white, well crimped wool, showing a free flow of white oil. The mature ram in full fleece will weigh from sixty to seventy-five pounds heavier. The picture shows a Delaine ram.

After hatching, the young worm crawls upon a blade of grass while it is wet with dew or rain. The worm then incloses itself in a mucous sheath and remains attached to the grass. In this condition it can remain unharmed by cold or drought much longer. If the grass is eaten the encysted worm reaches the stomach of the browsing sheep, where it soon matures.

In the spring, soon after the lambing period, the old sheep should all receive a one or two ounce dose of gasoline, followed by a small dose of epsom salts. They should then be turned on a worm free pasture if possible. In July the entire herd, including the lambs, could be treated with gasoline and turned into a new pasture. This treatment should be repeated in November, when the flock should again be removed to new pasture. Pasture sanitation combined with drugs that are injurious to the worms is the most practical method of successfully combating this worm.

Artists in Mother-of-pearl.

The incrustations of precious woods with mother-of-pearl is in Hanoi, French Tonquin, an important industry, an entire street, known as the "street of the inlayers," being devoted to it. Landscapes gleaming in the sun, sheaves of many colored flowers, the most delicate arabesques and many other beautiful things are evolved by the deft and pliant fingers of the artists, and marvelous cabinets and other articles are fashioned and put together without the aid of mills by dovetailing and lacquer paste.

WHAT ROADS MAY BE IMPROVED

A Satisfactory System of Highways Quite Feasible.

WISE EXPENDITURE VITAL.

Not Every Road is Worth the Same Amount of Improvement Nor is Every Road Worth Improving—Expenditures Should Be Determined by Amount of Traffic.

(Prepared by the United States department of agriculture.)

There are a little more than 2,225,000 miles of public roads in the United States. Not even the wildest enthusiast ever dreamed of turning all these miles into stretches of smooth, hard surfaced highways. Such an undertaking would be a financial impossibility and a waste of money even if the necessary funds could be raised. What is a truly precious, on the other hand, is well within the resources of the country and would save, not waste, money.

Of these 2,225,000 miles it has been estimated that approximately one-fifth carries four-fifths of the highway traffic of the United States. About 222,000 miles of road are already improved, so that the improvement of another quarter million of miles would put in good condition a system of highways over which would pass the great bulk of traffic. Furthermore in many sections of the country the improvement that is required by no means calls for the most expensive surfaces intended only to support the heaviest traffic. Along the southeastern seaboard, for example, good sand clay roads can be built at a cost as low as $1,000 per mile or less. In these sections, say the specialists of the department of agriculture, it would be absurd to lay down surfaces that cost $25,000 a mile, though these very surfaces may prove a real economy in centers of heavy population.

The task of creating, therefore, a thoroughly satisfactory system of highways for the United States is by no means as hopeless a one as it might seem at first sight. We have, in fact, gone a long way toward achieving it for the people who have become really interested in the question. In 1913 something over $205,000,000 was expended in money and labor on the roads of the United States, an increase of more than 170 per cent over the total of $73,000,000 in 1901. If this increase, or anything like it, continues in the next ten years and if there is the same increase in the scientific application of the money progress will be more than satisfactory.

It is, however, as necessary to spend the money wisely as to have the money to spend. Not every road is worth the same amount of improvement, not every road is worth improving at all. The classification of highways in accordance with their traffic requirements is, therefore, a necessary preliminary to a proper campaign of improvement. In most sections such a classification would reveal the fact that from 5 to 10 per cent of the mileage consists of main trunk lines used heavily by traffic originating both in and out of the country and forming links that can be forged into a chain of great importance to the state or even to the nation. An additional mileage, ranging from 10 to 20 per cent of the total, will be found to consist of secondary roads important for market traffic. The remainder will be made up of feeders and neighborhood roads which it is, of course, important to have as good as possible, but on which it would be bad business to spend large sums of money.

The amount of money put in it is good business to spend is determined by the amount of traffic over the road expressed in ton miles and the cost of hauling per ton mile. A ton mile, it may be said, is one ton of produce hauled one mile. Ten tons of produce hauled one mile is expressed as ten ton miles, and one ton hauled ten miles is also ten ton miles. By improving the road the cost of hauling per ton mile is greatly reduced. If the traffic is sufficiently heavy this reduction will amount to much more than the interest on the bonds and will leave an ample margin for the redemption of the principal. In other words, the community will make money out of its investment in good roads. If the traffic is not sufficiently heavy or not likely to be made so by the improvement the saving will not be great enough to pay the cost of the improvement.

Fair Warning.

A farmer engaged in to mow a small field of hay, and on giving him a new scythe told him it was such a good one that he need only put the point of it in the hay and it would cut by itself. But set off to his work, and about midday, when the farmer came to see how fast was getting on, he found him sitting in a corner of the field with one end of the scythe in the hay. This so enraged the farmer that he went for him, who, on seeing him, immediately shouted: "Keep back, keep back! Ye don't know the minute she's going to start!"—Exchange.

United States Laws.

An act when passed by both houses of congress and signed by the president becomes a law. If at any time thereafter questions of its constitutionality arise the matter is settled by the supreme court. The court has more than once declared acts of congress unconstitutional, as, for instance, the "civil rights" bill.—New York American.

An old lady from the rural districts and her small son were driving to town when a huge automobile bore down upon them. The horse was badly frightened and began to prance, whereupon, the old lady leaped and waved wildly to the chauffeur, screaming at the top of her voice. The chauffeur stopped the car and offered to help get the horse past. "That's all right," said the boy, who remained composedly in the carriage. "I can manage the horse. You just lead mother past."

An irate countryman, white with anger at being disturbed, says: "You book canvassers make me so angry with your confounded nerve and impudence that I cannot find words to express my indignation." I have here the very thing you need—a dictionary of the English language, containing all the words and slang phrases known, and only $2. Take it, and you will never be at a loss to express yourself again."

Some time ago a tramp was walking along, asking the pedestrians whom he met for alms. He stopped in front of the shop of a Jewish second-hand merchant. Suddenly he entered it and approached the dealer, saying, "Excuse me, sir, but would you kindly give me a few pennies for a bed?" The man looked at him and said with a characteristic business-like air: "Vare is dot bed? Let me see it."

Scientific Farming

CORN WILL BE HIGH.

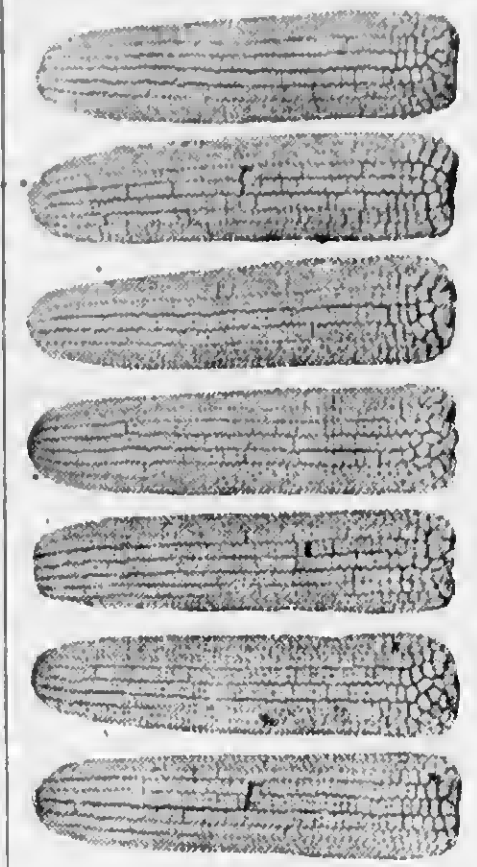

Early Planting of a Few Acres Advised by Kansas College Expert.

The chances are that corn will be high priced next July and August, believes C. C. Cunningham, assistant in cooperative experiments in the Kansas State Agricultural college. He believes that many farmers where the corn crop was short in 1914 will find the planting of a few acres of early corn profitable this season.

Growing a quick maturing variety of corn for early feed is sometimes a good practice. The farmer who is out of grain and has to buy high priced corn may cut down expenses by growing a few acres of early corn. An early variety planted as soon as reasonable conditions will permit will produce feeding corn from three to five weeks before the heavy yielding varieties of corn are ready to feed.

The larger growing, later maturing varieties of corn normally grown usually outyield the small growing, quick ma-

PRIZE EARS OF CORN EXHIBITED IN ILLINOIS SHOW.

riety ones because of the longer growing period of the former varieties. A considerable increase in yield must be obtained to make the growing of early corn under these conditions more profitable than planting the entire corn acreage to the varieties usually grown.

Ordinarily in eastern Kansas a standard variety of Kansas corn, which matures in 115 to 125 days, will outyield a ninety to ninety-five day corn ten or more bushels per acre, and on the average the growing of the larger varieties pays best because of the larger yield. It is only when the July or August price of corn is abnormally high and the following crop large, causing a decided decrease in price, that the early corn planting practice is recommended.

The usual practice in obtaining seed of early corn is to get it from the northern states. Early corn has to be grown in northern states because of the short season. In western Kansas a quick maturing variety of corn is necessary because of the low annual rainfall. Acclimated varieties of corn grown in western Kansas are hardy and vigorous growing. The indications are that these early varieties of western Kansas corn are better suited to eastern Kansas conditions than varieties similar in size and maturity from further north.

Winter Wheat and Spring Wheat. The Indiana experiment station (Central Indiana) finds that spring wheat yields half to two thirds as much grain as winter wheat on the same soil. The time to seed is as early as possible. The quantity about six pecks per acre.

VALUE OF COVER CROPS.

A blanket of cover crops is needed in every orchard at least half the year. An old orchard on sloping land, which is inclined to grow heavy wood on the trees at the expense of fruit bearing, needs a thick cover crop, such as common red or mammoth clover. In some successful orchards alfalfa has been used, and though it is not generally regarded as a desirable orchard cover crop, there are instances where the alfalfa in an old orchard has been pastured by hogs and has proved an advantage for a year or two. It is then turned under and the orchard cultivated clean for a couple of seasons, with winter cover crops of crimson clover or vetch.

The barometer of the orchard condition is the growth of wood and the condition in which fruit is matured. If the cover crop is too heavy and is allowed to sap the ground of moisture in midsummer the fact will immediately be noted in slow maturing fruit and short growth on the terminal branches of the trees.

Many old trees need to be checked in their growth of wood to make them produce. The abundance of blossoms in an orchard is evidence that the heavy cover crop has had this effect.—Country Gentleman.

HISTORY IN WAX FIGURES.

London's Famous Tussaud Show, With a Word About Its Founder.

At an average rate of one model per fortnight 1 must have turned a round thousand in my time, some in hot haste to be up to date, others at comparative leisure, being less meteoric and of more abiding interest—royal figures, for example, and men of letters, or great soldiers like Gordon, Wolseley and Roberts. Each stays as long as his fame endures. Nobody remembers when Shakespeare was not in the exhibition. Voltaire is its oldest inhabitant, and five generations have now passed before the figure of this revolutionary. The most notorious leaders of the French revolution are there, as of course the exhibition was transferred from Paris to London over 100 years ago.

It was in 1802 that Madame Tussaud came to London, having lived in Paris through the whole of the French revolution. Frequently had her art been requisitioned to mold the head of some sanguinary monster or other, Robespierre, Danton and Marat among the number. The cast of the last mentioned of this trio, still in the exhibition, was taken by Madame Tussaud at the scene of his murder, and later she made a cast of the once beautiful face of his assassin, Charlotte Corday. Madame came to London after seeing her husband

THE LACE OF VENICE.

An Ancient Industry That Was Revived by Queen Margherita.

The lace of Venice has been celebrated for many centuries. It was made originally by nuns within the walls of convents for ecclesiastical garments. Then, with the fall of the Venetian republic, the convents were closed and the lace industry ceased to exist for an entire century.

In 1870 the Princess Margherita, afterward queen of Italy, took measures to revive it, especially as a means of providing employment for Venetian women. At present there are several schools, subsidized by the government, in which the art is taught.

The pupils are women of all ages. Each sits on a low stool and holds a pump, square cushion in her lap. On this cushion is placed a strip of paper marked with the pattern to be followed, and into this pattern the nimble fingers, worker sticks glass headed pins, about which she twists her threads. From twenty to fifty shuttles depend from all sides of the cushion and these are thrown across and back with the rapidity of a typist handling the keys of her machine.

The process looks so simple that it looks like play, but the lace produced represents thousands of dollars. The simple lines grow rapidly under the dexterous fingers of the women, but the exquisite new pattern and other similar sorts are evolved much more slowly.—Harper's Weekly.

the porch, waited until Bruce and Gyp left the house, then crawled in at the window. He saw the loose plank and straightway investigated. He chuckled. Here were the goods, all right. He was surely a lucky man, and Bruce was becoming a careless one. A due day's work; Zudora fired and the smuggled diamonds under his vest. As he came out of the house he espied Baird boot-footing it no the nath.

"John, I'll marry you inside of three months."

"Hello! Where did you come from?" cried Hunt.

"Got lost. Saw Bruce and his man leaving and concluded that they had done for you," answered Baird, rather breathlessly.

"Not so you'd notice it. Jim, I've got the diamonds."

"By George, that's great work! Suppose we take after Mr. Bruce and nail him while the mulling's good."

"My idea."

"They run down the path to the road, but the quarry had disappeared. They hunted thoroughly, but for a long time failed to make any headway."

"They'll be around the boat landing Hustler!"

Near the dock where they had landed was an old steamer. They arrived

She Tried to Open Some of the Drawers.

In time to see two men enter the pilot-house, evidently to hide.

The two set off in pursuit.

From the pilot-house came like, who pounced upon Baird's back and downed him. Bruce and Gyp came to the second-hand aid, and they had Baird trussed up like a Christmas fowl in no time.

On the opposite side Radcliffe ran full tilt into Hunt, who wasn't expecting him. Radcliffe struck first, and Hunt crumpled up on the deck. Radcliffe coolly searched him, found the water bottle with the diamonds and concluded that his presence on the boat was no longer necessary. He had agent business in town.

They tied Baird up in the pilot-house. In one corner was a large box of ex-soldier. This they put around Baird's feet.

—AU—

"You're going to do a little stunt like that in Quo Vadis. Member? That!"

Radcliffe Coolly Searched Him.

Nero knew his business, all right. Burn 'em up when you don't like 'em, says he."

Baird struggled.

Gyp, the gun man, lit a cigarette and carefully tossed the match into the excelsior.

At this moment Hunt came to his senses. He reached for the water bottle. It was gone. Then he sought his automatic. But that was gone also. He got up. Three to one. He realized that he must go quickly for help. The motorboat engineer would help.

Like and Gyp had no real intention of setting fire to the old steamer. They had made the threat merely to add a little more torture to their victim's predicament. Hunt exclaims very in flammably. The flames swept up lustily. The two rogues began stamping on them, but to no avail.

"For Gaud's sake, like!" screamed Gyp.

"We got 't' out for it. We can't do nothing. What did you throw that match there for, y' fool?"

The two turned heel and ran. They wanted to be far away when the flames attracted outside attention. It was one thing to smuggle, to pick pockets, crack and a deep lonely laugh.

Mona crept from bed and went to the window. Behind the ruffled draperies she could remain unseen.

A tall, loose limbed young man leaped against a black horse while he lazily rolled a cigarette.

"It's this way, Billy," protested Boss Peters. "You've got to tend to your knittin' or out you go!"

Billy laughed gaily and pushed his hat back on his thick brown hair. Mona liked him at once. Here was the typical, handsome cowboy of romance!

"Very well, Peters," laughed Billy. "Just give me another mess of knittin' and I'll tend to it."

"The men went away together, and presently Mona saw Billy riding away down the trail."

"I should like him," thought Mona as she dressed for breakfast. "I must ask Mrs. Peters about him."

But Mrs. Peters was exasperatingly vague about Mona's compuncher.

"Billy, did you say, Miss Reinton?" she asked. "I'm sure I couldn't say for most every other one's named Billy something or other. There's Billy Thoms and little Billy and old Billy and Billy Barto. It might be Billy Barto. He speaks slowly and is always laughing. It might be him."

Mona blushed and changed the subject. Why should she be curious about this stranger?

After breakfast Boss Peters brought around a cream colored pony.

"You ride cross saddle, Miss Reinton?" he asked.

"Yes," said Mona as she came down to pet the pony. "Isn't he a dear? He looks good enough to eat!"

Mrs. Peters, in the doorway, laughed and told Mona that she herself looked good enough to eat.

"In that white linen skirt and blouse and white felt hat you'll charm the birds off the trees," predicted the boss' wife.

Mona laughed and rode away, a straight, slim, suddenly figure, her wide gray eyes fixed on the trail ahead, her cheeks growing pink with the exercise in the clear air.

She forgot all her cares—the financial troubles of Reinton & Co., which her engagement to young Barstow had amicably changed to prosperity—her engagement to a man she had never seen, for William was away on a hunting trip.

"I know I shall hate him!" sighed Mona as she suddenly remembered the Barstows.

The cream colored pony stepped into a gopher hole, and Mona flew over his head to fall prone upon the angrush.

One ankle twisted under her body. She screamed once when she tried to move and then flinched away.

Mona opened her eyes to gaze into a pair of dark blue ones. A strong arm supported her as Billy Barto knelt beside her.

"I heard you scream, and so I came along," he explained. "Is it your arm?"

"My ankle—it feels so queer," half sobbed Mona, her lovely face pale with agony.

He rode close beside her all the way home, chattering her with stories of the cattle country, even bringing a mule to her white tips up a recital of his own early adventures.

The Impossible Man

How He Became Possible

By CLARISSA MACKIE

Mona Reinton looked at her uncle with wide, horrified eyes.

"Marry a man I have never seen? Impossible!" she cried indignantly.

Silas Reinton frowned, but his voice did not lose its quality of patience.

"But, my dear Mona, I have told you that William is an exceptionally fine young man, and your marriage to him would save the business from ruin. His father has promised that."

"Why?" demanded Mona.

Mr. Reinton gazed out of the window. "Jim Barstow loved your mother, Mona, and failed to win her. I believe he wants his son to marry your mother's daughter. In fact, he told me so when I went to seek a loan from him."

"It's a bargain—a cold, cruel business transaction, Uncle Silas!" cried the girl passionately. "But you have been so good to me, like a father and mother in one, that I cannot refuse. Tell Mr. Barstow I will marry his son, but on all the world, Uncle Silas, I am sure that this William is the one man I would not voluntarily choose to marry."

"The impossible man, eh?" smiled Mr. Reinton, drawing her toward him. "The impossible man!" agreed Mona, shuddering.

And when the next day came she had persuaded her uncle to permit her to spend a month upon his ranch in Montana.

"When I return I will meet Mr. William Barstow," she pleaded. And so she was piloted in, go, planning to visit several school friends by the way.

It was several weeks after her conversation with her uncle that she arrived at the Double Circle ranch and was welcomed by motherly Mrs. Peters, wife of the boss.

Mona went directly to bed and was awakened early the next morning by the sound of voices under her window.

Boss Peters was talking to some one, a man with a lazy, drawling voice and a deep lonely laugh.

Mona crept from bed and went to the window. Behind the ruffled draperies she could remain unseen.

Attar of Roses.

Over 3,000 pounds of rose petals are used in the manufacture of one pound of attar of roses perfume.

At last they reached the ranch house. Mona swooned away when Billy lifted her from the saddle and gave her into the keeping of Mrs. Peters.

Finally Mrs. Peters came downstairs. Her round eyes twinkled when she saw the anxious compuncher.

"How is she? Shall I go for the doctor?" said Billy.

Mrs. Peters laughed. "She is fast asleep. You needn't bother going after the doctor. I'm better than a dozen doctors, specially with sprained ankles and such. You know, this is a gopher country."

"Well, I'll be bliking along," he said reluctantly, then, turning quickly, he asked sharply:

"Who is she, Mrs. Peters?"

"You mean Miss Mona?" she asked innocently.

"Miss Mona," he repeated, "thanks," and he added to himself, "I wonder what her first name is?"

During Mona's convalescence she spent many an hour in the hammock while Billy Barto read to her from his favorite authors, who at a time became her favorites also.

Mona liked Billy Barto from the very beginning. When she began to love him she never knew, but perhaps it was that day when he dropped his book and, bending over her, crushed her hands in his own.

Mona looked up into his tense face, and the lovely color left her own.

"Oh, Billy Barto, don't say a word!" she cried piteously. "I cannot listen!"

"The words are on my lips, dear," he said steadily, "but I am not free to utter them."

"It is the same with me," she murmured sadly.

"You—your engaged?" he whispered, and when she nodded dreadingly he added grudgingly, "So am I."

After a silence he asked:

"Shall I go away from here?"

"No! I am going home tomorrow."

"Do not tell me where. I must not know anything more about you or nothing could keep me from following you to the end of the world," he muttered.

Then, with one last crushing pressure of her slim hands, he was gone.

Mona closed her eyes while slow tears forced themselves through the thick fringes of her lashes.

Tomorrow she would be on her way home to Uncle Silas, and she must be prepared to fulfill her promise to marry Jim Barstow's son.

She did not see Billy again. Mrs. Peters did not mention the name of the handsome compuncher, and Mona did not see his face among the merry crowd which accompanied her to the station, riding on either side of the buckboard, nothing like schoolboys on a holiday.

Home again among the luxurious surroundings of Silas Reinton's town house, the days spent on the Double Circle ranch seemed to Mona like a dream.

That first night at dinner Uncle Silas broke an awkward silence. The servants had left the room, and Mona was toying with some grapes, her gray eyes fixed dreamily on space.

"If you are not too tired, Mona, I would like to have you meet Mr. Barstow and his son. They are coming at 9 o'clock."

"Very well, Uncle Silas," she said indifferently. "And did—the business come out all right, as you expected?"

"Yes, and I didn't require Jim Barstow's help after all. But as you have promised to marry William it is only fair that you should meet him. And if you don't want to marry him now—"

"It doesn't matter much, Uncle Silas," she murmured, her heart sore at the thought of her broken romance, jealous of that girl to whom Billy Barto was engaged.

Mr. Reinton eyed her sharply as he held the door open for her to pass out. The old sparkle and glow were gone. If this engagement to young Barstow was distasteful to Mona why was she not more joyous at her release?

He went into the library and picked up the evening mail. On top was a letter from Boss Peters of the Double Circle, and tucked inside was a note from Mrs. Peters.

As he read Silas Reinton smiled.

At 9 o'clock, when the Barstows were introduced, Silas was in the drawing room with Mona.

First came James Barstow, handsome, dignified and smiling. Behind him towered a younger man in immaculate evening dress.

Before the older men could greet each other Mona had flown down the long room to meet Jim Barstow's tall son.

"Oh, Billy Barto!" she cried. "Billy, Billy!"

Their hands met, and his arms encircled her.

At bay, they turned and faced the astonished old men.

"Father, this is the girl I must marry," declared Billy Barto, and James Barstow turned to his lifelong friend for an explanation.

For several moments they held a whispered conversation; then Silas Reinton came forward.

"Mona," he said, and Billy Barto turned a startled glance upon him, "somehow or other you have met young William Barstow, and you have changed your mind about marrying him, I see."

Then it was Billy's turn to explain that, disliking the idea of engaging himself to an unknown girl, he had gone west to forget his troubles in one last, spirit of freedom. By chance he had hit upon Reinton's ranch and engaged himself as a cowboy.

"The rest we know—how he met and loved Mona Reinton and how after they had parted as, as they thought, forever they met again."

"So the impossible man became possible after all!" declared Uncle Silas.

Identified.
In many parts of England and especially in the villages of the Black country it is quite a common thing for a man to be known so exclusively by a nickname that his real name is forgotten. A gentleman had occasion once to ask a porter for the whereabouts of a certain John Williams.
"John Williams?" repeated the man incredulously, knitting his brows. "I have heard tell of it, John Williams—it is familiar. I say, sir," he explained, as if seized by a sudden inspiration, "do he be married?"
"That's so," was the reply.
"And hez three of a family?"
"I believe so."
"Well, sir, I'm John Williams."

LIVE STOCK HUSBANDRY

SHEEP RAISING PAYS.

When Properly Cared For They Are Valuable Farm Animals

The principles of sheep husbandry must first be learned in order to be successful in the business and derive a profit, writes a correspondent of the American Cultivator. That sheep are valuable on a farm is certain. The fertility of any land which is cut down can very quickly be built up again if sheep are placed upon it. For this reason the sheep has its proper name, the "golden hoof." It may be mentioned right here that sheep will never thrive and do well if kept on low, wet, marshy land. They will, however, improve the fertility of the land on which they are and by no means ever lower it.

It is an undisputed fact that the manure of sheep is much richer than that of other live stock, with the exception of that of chickens. And furthermore, they themselves spread the manure more evenly on the land than any other spreader can do. Thus, as yet, we have not invented a good heavy crop of grain, corn or vegetable may be expected when a coat of sheep manure has been applied on the land.

The Hampshire breed of sheep, which somewhat resembles the Shropshire, is increasing in popularity in this country. It has many points commending it as a farm breed. One of its strong characteristics is the rapid growth made by the lambs when young. Hampshire shires are the largest of the medium wool breeds. They are heavy animals and for grazing on rough land are perhaps not so well adapted as some of the lighter and more active breeds. The picture shows a prize winning Hampshire ram.

Another advantage of keeping sheep is that they are very fond of weeds and will eat some of them in preference to good grass. Anthrillides claim that sheep will eat over 100 of the 200 different kinds of weeds which grow on our farms. Many times they will also eat the waste grass around fences and corners which is left by other stock.

It is a general complaint nowadays all over the country that competent labor is very scarce, but it must be said that in the time when the farmer is busiest with his plowing, seeding, cultivating and harvesting, his sheep will cause him the least amount of work, and thus may be called "labor savers." If at this time they have enough grass to eat, good fresh water to drink and have access to salt when times they will be fully satisfied.

TEMPERANCE NOTES

BREWERS URGE MODERATION?

The annual meeting of the United States Brewers' association was recently held in New Orleans. Commenting on the printed report of that meeting, Henry J. Allen, in the Wichita Beacon says:

We note that the deepest concern of the annual meeting was, as usual, for the taxpayer. They made it perfectly plain to everybody that so far as the brewers themselves were concerned, they didn't care anything for prohibition—they could, in fact, sell more booze under prohibition than without it—but they did not want the government to lose the revenue, they didn't want the taxpayer burdened; they just wanted everything to go on in a free and easy and open way, with the taxpayer as he is now in the states where the saloons run the politics.

And above all, the brewers urged "moderation," not in drinking, but in the language with which the discussions against liquor are carried on. They also desire to save the hop and barley fields from being destroyed. While prohibition increases beer sales, it apparently ruins the hop and barley crops.

One gem from the wisdom of this convention is that "beer may be substituted for bread."

Frequently it is also substituted for shoes and school books and clothes and meat and house rent and furniture. In fact, a liberal use of it will make it a substitute for everything except the grave.

Another piece of philosophy garnered from the book of brewers' wisdom is that "the only difference between bread and beer is that bread is baked, while beer is boiled."

It did not add, however, that the user of it is frequently stewed.

EX-SALOON KEEPER TESTIFIES.

A former Red Wing (Minn.) saloon keeper, Mr. Lohman, now engaged in the clothing business in McHenry, N. D., recently visited his old friends in Red Wing. While disclaiming any pretensions to being a total abstainer, he gave some excellent testimony to the value of prohibition.

"One reason why we are not anxious to have a saloon in our town is that it would draw the kind of people from other places that we do not want; we like a good, clean town."

"It is said so often that prohibition does not prohibit, Mr. Lohman," remarked a reporter. "If a man goes to McHenry and wants a drink, can he get it?" "No, not for love nor money," replied Mr. Lohman with emphasis. "There is no liquor to be had in our town except for medicinal purposes."

"Then a crowd of young men cannot start out and have a gloriously good time in McHenry?" "I should say they cannot," replied Mr. Lohman, "because there is no place where they can get the liquor. There has been no bootlegging during the last few years. The law is being enforced rigidly and there is no evidence anywhere of drunkenness."

BETTER LIE LOW.

The following incident is told by the Philadelphia North American Review:

A West Philadelphia liquor dealer recently consulted an acquaintance in the real estate business about the advisability of transferring his license from a side street location to a Market street corner. The change would involve an increased investment. "Stay where you are," counseled the real estate expert. "You would get a more prominent situation by moving; but that, in my judgment, is just what you should avoid. Better stay where you're tolerated. If you try to get out on Market street, you'll only attract attention and stir up opposition. Public opinion is getting mighty sensitive about the saloon business, and you'd run the chance of losing the place you've got."

"I guess you're right," said the saloon-keeper. "I put the proposition up to one of the biggest men in the wholesale trade. 'Don't think of it,' he said. 'Don't invest another dollar. And make all you can now, for inside of ten years we'll all be put out of business.'"

SLUMP IN VALUES.

Federal Judge Landis of Chicago, undertaking to dispose of the 89 licenses that came into his possession with the bankruptcy of the Tosetti Brewing company, found that while a year ago licenses brought from $2,500 to $2,800, but one offer was made, and that for only $1,200. This he refused. Fear of successful antisaloon legislation is the reason, given, brewers, speculators and license brokers anticipating further dry activity.

EASY TO BUY MEDICINES.

Kansas consumes per annum per capita, $1.25 worth of liquor for all purposes as against the average consumption of liquor of $21 per head. No wonder the Kansans have their own automobiles.

THE KITCHEN CUPBOARD

UTILIZING COLD TURKEY.

If there is cold turkey in the house after Thanksgiving try making it up in one of the delicious dishes mentioned here. Cold turkey is apt to pall on the taste, and these viands have the merit of variety.

Cold turkey can be used in making almost any dish for which cold fowl is available.

Piquant Vindes.

Broiled or Deviled Turkey.—Turkey legs broiled or deviled are considered a choice morsel by a great many critics. The legs are cut from a cold cooked turkey and sprinkled with salt, pepper and cayenne and lemon juice. They are broiled to a warm brown and served with melted butter. For deviling mustard and paprika are added to the seasoning, the legs being scored so that the mixture may penetrate. A good currant jelly should be used plentifully in the service with this dish.

Served on Toast.

Mixed Turkey.—Mixed turkey with poached egg is a nice breakfast dish. The meat may be cold broiled or roasted. It is trimmed clean of all skin and fat and the choice portions of the turkey should be used. Season with salt and pepper and a tablespoonful of mixed celery. Chop turkey meat and put it in a pan with melted butter very hot and just a touch of onion; add a little turkey broth to moisten. Poach one egg more for each person. Arrange the mixed turkey on buttered toast with the egg on top and serve.

Combined With Aspic.

Cold Turkey With Sauce.—Cut the flesh off the breast of a large turkey that has been cooked and cooled, then cut in thin fillets lengthwise, trim them to an equal length and lay them side by side on a baking pan after dipping them in a sauce made from the broth of the turkey and aspic jelly that has been allowed to thicken on the ice. Lay the fillets rest and coat them with aspic jelly. Make a pyramid of them, with cooked truffles, turkey meat mixed with mayonnaise and celery and decorations of jelly. Tongue and cold turkey fillets in jelly may be added if desired and fresh, crisp lettuce leaves, olives etc., can be used as a garnish.

THE ROAD MAKER.

The civilized man makes roads; the savage does not. That is the safest test of civilization.

Among us, in all communities, are individuals who are not truly civilized. They do not take any interest in roads.

A man's scale in civilization is very correctly tested by his attitude toward the stone which has rolled into the road or the tree which has blown down across it. The man who drives around the obstacle day after day is one sort of man; the one who stops his team and rolls or drags it away is another. And a person passing along a road which he does not expect to retrace who removes the obstruction for the sake of the stranger who comes after him responds to a very high test of civilization. He feels socially.

When the snow piles up in the road the man who goes ahead and breaks the path for others bears the burden which he who has made progress always must bear. There is snow in every road—to cooperation, to better schools, to better business methods. There must be road breakers for every path. The road maker is the great civilizer.—Farm and Fireside.

ADVOCATES BRICK ROADS.

Initial Cost Comparatively Heavy, but Maintenance Much Less.

W. O. Griffith, editor of the Monthly Bulletin of the Automobile Club of Philadelphia, has studied the results of road building of various kinds in different states and concludes that brick roads are far superior for taxed heavy traffic, including horses and motor-trucks, as well as pleasure cars.

But stone, or flagstone blocks, and brick are both too noisy for use in cities, where wood blocks are the most efficient. For building roads in the country, cut stone is too expensive, and where there is heavy traffic the cost of maintenance of macadam roads is also too expensive. Mr. Griffith advocates the use of brick on all well traveled roads as real economy. The initial cost of laying down good macadam road varies from $8,000 to $12,000 per mile, and brick road varies from $12,000 to $18,000 per mile. The maintenance cost of macadam road, however, is approximately $1,000 per mile per year, while for brick it is estimated at $75 per mile per year—in fact, New Jersey has spent $1,500 per mile per year for her macadam roads.

"The vital principle in road construction," Mr. Griffith says, "is that of the cost of maintenance. New York has used patent bituminous pavements since 1908, and the experience of western New York in the vicinity of Rochester and Buffalo is that for the market roads in the towns, where horse traffic is heavy, brick is the only possible road to use, although its first cost is high. They find that for high speed automobile roads, bituminous surfaces of a good grade, such as coated stone, have been found satisfactory. However, on such roads where horse traffic becomes heavy, or at curves, maintenance cost immediately increases rapidly, while the same does not appear to be the case with brick roads under similar conditions."

GOOD ROADS MOVEMENT.

Remarkable Progress Made in United States During Recent Years.

That remarkable progress has been made in the building of good roads throughout the United States during the past few years is proved by data recently published in the official Good Roads Year Book for 1915. It has been found that more than 34,000 miles of surfaced roads have been constructed during 1913 and 1914 and that during the ten year period from 1904 to 1914 more than 24,000 miles have been completed. That this progress has been really amazing may be understood from the fact that in 1904 there were only 153,000 miles of surfaced roads of all types in the United States. That the movement is attaining momentum as it goes is proved by the fact that while the average mileage constructed per annum during the past ten years is 9,000 miles, the total completed for 1914 exceeded 18,000 miles. The report shows that something like 30,000 miles of highway have been completed with the aid of state funds, of which over $200,000,000 have been expended. The state aid movement began in 1892 and has therefore continued for twenty-two years. Only recently has it got well under way, as the results accomplished for 1913 and 1914 comprise a total of 10,000 miles of state aid highways completed, or in two years' time one-third of the entire mileage constructed with the aid of state funds has been completed.

Only six states now out of a total of forty-eight are without state highway departments, and thirty states have granted actual money aid to the building of roads.

Highway Commission and Earth Road.

In some of the states, particularly those in the Mississippi valley, the state highway commissions are rendering valuable aid in the improvement of earth roads. These commissions prepare addresses and issue bulletins on road subjects, and some of them have officials who give at least a part of their time to the earth roads. Of these commissions perhaps that of Iowa is doing more for earth roads than that of any other state.

Farm and Garden

USE OF MECHANICAL SEEDER.

Distributes Seed More Evenly and Effects Great Saving in Quantity.

With clover, alfalfa, sweet clover and all the grass seeds usually enough seed is used to the acre for three or four good stands. If every seed took root and grew where it fell on the soil there would be so many plants to the square yard that none could grow well. They would stand so thickly that they would smother each other to death. Where mechanical seeders are used to distribute the seed uniformly over the surface of the soil much less seed per acre will be required. By using a mechanical seeder for uniform distribution and covering the seed mechanically a saving of fully one-half of the seed can be effected.

Some farmers are afraid to disturb the soil of their wheat fields and meadows in spring. Where clover or other small seed is to be sown in wheat in the spring the soil when dry may be cut with a disk or toothed harrow without any injury to the wheat. In most cases the surface working will do the wheat good, and it is a sure means of planting the clover or grass seed. It is good practice to cut the surface of the field in spring with a disk harrow for the purpose of planting with clover or alfalfa. A disk harrow with a tooth barrow after cutting the surface with this disk.

Sweet clover is coming into general prominence all over the country. One reason why more farmers do not grow it or try it is that they have been told animals will not eat the growing plants over the hay. It is true that most farm animals will not eat sweet clover at first, but as soon as they get a good taste of it and become used to it they will eat it as readily as the best corn, clover or alfalfa.

Sweet clover should be sown early in the spring. It is a splendid crop to go before alfalfa to inoculate and enrich the soil. It grows rankly in wet soil and will grow large in soil too dry for almost any other cultivated plants. If used for pasture, unlike alfalfa, stock should be turned out while the plants are young, so they will learn to eat it before it grows old and woody. It is a biennial, like red clover, and will self seed if allowed to form seed every year.

The modern disk drill, of which there are many good makes, is the only good drill to use. Pages of space would be required to tell of all its good merits over the old style drill.—Iowa Home-stead.

TO GET RID OF BEETLES.

If we could kill off all the June bugs or May beetles we should have as white grub.

Each female beetle lays between fifty and a hundred eggs, each of which is pretty likely to hatch into a grub to feed on corn roots, grains, strawberries and the like.

There are three well known ways to kill the beetles.

One is to spray poison on the leaves of the trees on which they feed.

The second is to spread sheets, tarpaulins or canvas under the trees and jar the beetles down with a hattering rain made of a plank with a cushion on the end, similar to the scheme for collecting the cuniculi.

The third takes advantage of the beetles' fondness for a lamp at night. Hang an ordinary kerosene lantern over a tub of water on the surface of which is a film of kerosene.

The latter plan seems most promising, as it induces the bugs to seek their own destruction. They fall into the oil when trying to do whatever they try to do to the light.—Farm and Fireside.

PATCHING IN PUBLIC.

Street Sewers in China Mend Torn Garments While You Wait.

In many towns of China one may have his garments mended on the street and "while he waits." Native sewing women are to be seen on low stools perhaps on the sidewalks mending articles of masculine attire.

The accomplishments of these street seamstresses are somewhat limited, their efforts with the needle being for the most part confined to "mending." Other branches of needlework are practically unknown to them. As a consequence their efforts are better appreciated by native workmen than by foreign travelers.

They are never short of patrons among the former, for these are often natives of other districts and, having come to the city to engage in business, have no one to mend a rent for them. Their wives being left at home, they are glad to avail themselves of the services of the street needlewomen. For this class of customers the skill of the itinerant sewing women answers every purpose.

Generally speaking, these women are wives of boatmen and laborers who live in the houseboats which float the creeks of many Chinese cities and towns, and their needles are a great help toward the solution of the problem of maintenance in a crowded city or town.—Washington Star.

Lights.

Mr. Pickleleilly came home from his club one morning about 5 o'clock. He entered his happy home, crept up the stairs softly so as not to awaken his spouse, then felt for the switch to turn on the electric light. He could not find it and in the darkness stumbled over a chair.

"What's that?" came a voice from the bed.

"Where in the deuce are the lights in this house?" snarled Pickleleilly, trying in his bluff to put a bold face on the matter.

"Lights?" cried Mrs. Pickleleilly, smilingly. "Pull up the blinds!"—Judge.

Modern Buildings.

Probably not one out of every 10,000 buildings standing in all parts of the world, and built by modern means will be standing 500 years hence. We do not know how to put stones and bricks together as the ancients did, and consequently the buildings we raise nowadays are really mere temporary structures and will be in ruins when the ancient buildings of Greece and Egypt, built thousands of years ago, are in as good condition as they are now.

KNOW THYSELF.

It is of dangerous consequence to represent to man how near he is to the level of beasts without showing him at the same time his greatness. It is likewise dangerous to let him see his greatness without his meanness. It is more dangerous yet to leave him ignorant of either, but very beneficial that he should be made sensible of both.—Pascal.

MAY COME IN JULY

Manager A. F. Bridge Trying to Secure Famous Musical Comedy Organization.

At the time of the year when we are harboring within our gates several thousand summer visitors most of the big theatrical attractions are off the road. Were it not for this fact many larger shows than those presented here in the past would include this city in their itinerary. An effort is being made by Manager A. F. Bridge of the Charlevoix Theatre to overcome this disadvantage and indications are that he will accomplish his purpose. In conjunction with other summer resort cities in northern Michigan, Mr. Bridge is negotiating with Boyle Woolfolk, Inc., for an appearance here of the famous LaSalle (Chicago) Musical Comedy Co.

This company numbers nearly half a hundred and presents the famous LaSalle Shows, "The Time, the Place and the Girl," "Miss Nobody from Starland," "The Girl Question," "My Cinderella Girl," "Lovers and Lunatics," and "The Dream Girl," the sextette of successes that made Mort H. Singer a millionaire. Complete scenic productions are carried for the entire repertoire. It is much larger than any show that has played this section in recent years.

The showmen want a certain guarantee for a certain number of weeks in this section. Whether enough towns can afford to put up the required amount will decide whether the show will come here. Mr. Bridge expects to hear definitely in a few days.

Two Splendid Attractions Have Been Booked for the Charlevoix Theatre in the near future.

The Sheeran Opera Company, one of the leading companies in their line on the road, are billed to appear here on June 30. On July 12, 13, and 14, the Boyle Woolfolk Musical Comedy Company will give one of the finest attractions ever shown in Charlevoix.

In order to bring these two companies to Charlevoix it was necessary for the management to make some very strong inducements, and we trust that the public will show their appreciation by giving them a very hearty reception. Further announcements and advertisements of these two attractions will appear from week to week.

Additional Locals

School closes this week.

Charles Marshall and wife of Saginaw, are visiting friends and relatives in this city.

School Commissioner J. H. Milford of East Jordan was in the city Friday on business.

Mr. and Mrs. Gene Marshall of Traverse City, are guests at the home of Mr. and Mrs. T. G. Fluncan.

George Carr, wife and son, of East Jordan, spent Sunday in the city at the home of Mr. Carr's mother, Mrs. H. A. Carr.

Mrs. Gracia Wood, who has been spending the winter in Chicago, returned to her home in this city this latter part of the week.

Workmen are repairing the Geiken building, south of the Hotel Charlevoix. The building will be occupied by A. E. Samra at Grand Rapids, who will conduct a restaurant.

Mr. and Mrs. G. W. Priest moved Tuesday from their pleasant home on Dixon avenue to the rooms in the studio on Bridge street. Their Dixon avenue home will be occupied during the resort season by the Stearns family from Chicago.

St. Joseph school of East Jordan came to this city on Thursday last on an excursion. In a ball game in the afternoon they were defeated by St. Mary's team by a score of 7 to 8. Quite a number came over and the day was greatly enjoyed.

People planning on attending the graduation exercises of the Charlevoix high school should keep in mind that on both Class Day; Wednesday evening, June 9, and commencement, Friday evening, June 11, all seats down stairs with the exception of the back row are reserved. The entire balcony is unreserved.

H. B. Wood has greatly enlarged and refurnished the office room at his livery barn on Bridge street. This will be used as a waiting room in the future in connection with the bus line operated between the depot and the Belvedere. Mr. Wood will plan on keeping two autos in the route during the season, and patrons will be given the opportunity of having a comfortable place to rest in case of having to wait for a car.

Every young lady may mark it down as a fact that if she flirts and associates with "pick-ups" she will soon have no others for associates. No matter how unjust it may be, there will always be a suspicion that those who are not above making acquaintances in this way are not as pure in heart and mind as they ought to be. It would be unjust to say no pure minded girls flirt. They do and many of them lose their purity by so doing. Others, though not so unfortunate, subject themselves to suspicions which every woman should be above.

SCHOOL YEAR WORK CLOSES

C. H. S. Class of 1915 Graduates With High Honors.

Exercises at the Opera House Wednesday and Friday Nights Well Attended.

Charlevoix has always been justly proud of its young people, for time has shown that our little city has many young men and women who have made good in the world of affairs.

The commencement of life in the world is a great event, not only for those who experience it, but also for those who sit and anxiously wait what the future has in store for those whom we wish most good things.

The class of 1915 represents sixteen young people of high character and scholarship, and as they marched under the arches held by the juniors, you could read and see that education does pay.

Prof. S. B. Laird convinced us that education of the right sort, and that which tends to bring out all that was in a man and fit him for all the offices of life, both private and public, was a paying proposition. That our chances were increased to become all that nature intended for us by receiving an adequate education. It made us better thinkers, gave us more poise, gave us a greater appreciation of the beauties of life and its untold possibilities. From the expression of the audience, it was possible to determine that the people were convinced that it does pay to educate.

The solos by Mrs. S. A. Bush and Mrs. W. J. Rachow were beautifully rendered and well received.

R. W. Kane, president of the Board of Education, in a few well-chosen remarks, presented the class of 1915 with their diplomas.

The exercises were a fitting close to a very successful school year.

Class Day Exercises

Wednesday night was held the "Class Day" of the graduating class of the Charlevoix High School. Nine of the seniors presented a comedy "Pygmalion and Galatea." This was the surprise of the season. Miss Bernice Bush as Pygmalion and Miss Ruth Mitchell as Galatea, were the stars of the evening, and not one did his or her part poorly. All showed a great amount of dramatic ability, and also the effects of seven weeks of painstaking drill by their instructors.

The play itself was very interesting, with a clever plot with which the general public is already familiar. The costumes and makeups were excellent, showing great care and good taste. This is one of the best home-talent plays we have ever seen or ever expect to see.

This same play was given in a slightly different form in the Chataqua last summer, and many have expressed the opinion that the acting and execution of this performance, Wednesday night, was much better and more enjoyable in every way than that of the professional actors last summer. At the close of third act, the whole class assembled on the stage and rendered the class song, "The Purple and the White," which are the class colors. Much credit should be given to the class of 1915 for the tasteful decorations.

Well-Known Charlevoix Young People Married in Traverse City, Sunday.

Miss Hilda V. Reed and Mr. R. Dwight McGeath were united in marriage by Rev. W. McKee, in the Methodist parsonage in Traverse City on Sunday last. A short time ago he opened a gent's furnishing store at Beaverton, Gladwin county. He is well and favorably known here and his business ability is well spoken of by those in this city who have employed him.

Mrs. McGeath is the daughter of Mrs. J. R. Cooper, and was one of the graduating class of the C. H. S. this year. She has been a teacher in the Methodist Sunday school, and is favorite with the young people of our city.

The happy young couple will start immediate housekeeping in Beaverton. They carry with them the best wishes of the entire community for a long, useful and prosperous life.

VALUATION OF CITY $2,383,095

Final Figures as Equalized by the Board of Review.

Result Shows an Increase of $17,150 Over Last Year's Valuation—Personal $415,350.

The total assessed valuation of the City of Charlevoix, both real estate and personal, as equalized by the Board of Review, is $2,383,095.

The valuation of the city, as assessed by City Assessor D. F. Meech, both real and personal, for the three wards totaled $2,383,145. This means a decrease of $6,050 by the board of review, over the figures of the assessor. However, the above figures, as equalized by the board of review, show and increase of $17,150 over the total assessed valuation of the city for the year 1914.

The raise over the assessed valuation of 1914, was practically all made in the valuation of the first ward, the second ward remaining about the same as last year's figures, and the third ward showing a slight decrease.

Valuations of real estate, as assessed by the city assessor and equalized by the board of review, in the three wards of the city, are as follows:

First Ward.
Assessed by assessor.....$800,235
Equalized by board.....799,935

Second Ward.
Assessed by assessor.....$539,535
Equalized by board.....537,385

Third Ward.
Assessed by assessor.....$631,625
Equalized by board.....629,425

The total amount of personal property in the three wards of the city, as assessed by the assessor, amounted to $416,750. These figures were changed by the board of review to $415,350, thus making the total of personal in the city $415,350 or $1,400 less than assessed by City Assessor Meech.

It was estimated by the common council, that to defray the running expenses of the city during the current year, $19,056.76 would be required, thus making an eight mill tax.

AUTO DRIVERS INVITING DEATH; SPEED MANIACS MUST BE CURBED

Number of Accidents Growing Greater Every Day—Is it Due to Defective Legislation or to Laxity in Enforcing Regulations We Now Have—Speed Must Be Kept Down.

There seems to be a disheartening multiplicity of automobile accidents. Every issue of the papers contains some item of killed or maimed, and many narrow escapes. It is getting so common that it takes something out of the ordinary—along the same lines of the horrible accident published in the columns of this paper last week, to shock us into more than lip sympathy.

To what are they due? To defective legislation, laxity in enforcing such regulations as we now have, or to the general carelessness of many people who continually tempt fate with their reckless driving.

It may be that stricter legislation is part of the need, if there is to be a remedy, and it is certain that the existing laws should be so rigorously enforced as to act as a salutary warning to those heedless ones who persist in running automobiles when they ought to be breaking stone somewhere.

It is true that strict enforcement of our laws and ordinances would require a larger police force than the city's purse has heretofore felt able to allow, but regardless of this it should stimulate zeal in punishing those offenders who do get caught. A few days in jail without the opportunity of a fine would serve to disabuse from the mind of some of these speed maniacs that pedestrians were common game for the speeders and that it was always the open season.

Boys and girls should not be permitted to drive machines unless accompanied by their parents or persons who will see that they do not drive their cars at an unsafe speed, and every effort should be made to keep the speed limit down to the margin of safety.

There is no question that reckless driving is the bottom of most of the accidents, and all the attention the police can give this factor will be remedial.

The careful driver is an honor to the ranks of automobilists, but he who disregards all the dictates of safety is a menace and should not be allowed at large.

A large per cent. of the drivers of automobiles today have little knowledge of the law regarding their rights on public highways, the speed to be maintained, and their conduct in passing or meeting horse-drawn vehicles. At the same time the drivers of vehicles have little knowledge of the rights of the automobile on the public highway, and the laws governing what they are required to do when vehicle and automobile meet. In many instances each disregard the rights of the other, with the result that the driver of the vehicle is forced into the ditch, or the automobile is forced to drive over ground unfit for travel. The result is continual friction and hard feelings between the driver of the horse-drawn vehicle and the automobile.

The law plainly states the rights of each, and if all would observe these regulations, but few accidents and little trouble would be the result. For the benefit of drivers of both classes, we reproduce below several sections of the state law, which are the least observed:

Law of the Road.
Drive to the right.—Whenever any persons shall meet each other on any bridge or road, each driver should turn to the right, so that each may pass without interference.

Unlawful to employ driver addicted to drink.—No person operating any vehicle used for public conveyance, shall employ a driver who is addicted to the use of intoxicating liquors. If this provision is violated, the owner shall be subject to a fine of five dollars per day for the entire time such driver has been in his employ, and any owner who shall continue in his employ a driver addicted to the use of intoxicating liquors after having received written notice of this fact, shall be subject to the same fine, for the time such driver is in his employ.

Penalty for running horses.—No driver of vehicles used for public conveyance shall run horses, or in any manner cause them to run. By doing this he is subject to a fine not to exceed $100, or by imprisonment for thirty days, or both. Drivers of public conveyances are also subject to heavy fines for leaving their horses untied.

Regulation of Motor Vehicles.

Stopping on Signal.—Any person operating a motor vehicle, shall, at the request or on signal by putting up the hand, from a person leading or driving a horse, bring their car to a dead stop, and if traveling in an opposite direction, remain stationary so long as may be reasonable to allow such animal to pass, and if traveling in the same direction, use reasonable caution in thereafter passing such horse; provided, that if such animal appears badly frightened, or the person operating the car be requested to do so, such person shall cause the motor to cease running so long as shall be reasonably necessary to prevent accident and insure the safety of others.

When Meeting Vehicles.—When operators or drivers of motor-driven vehicles shall meet horse-drawn vehicles on the highway, and there is no reason to stop as above provided, each shall turn to the right and give half the road.

Passing on the Road.—If horse or motor vehicle be overtaken by motor vehicle, and driver shall express a desire to pass, it shall be the duty of the driver of such vehicle overtaken, to turn to the right of the centre of the road and give the person making the request an opportunity to pass, the one passing using due care in so doing, and render assistance if necessary.

Rate of Speed.—No person shall operate a motor vehicle upon a public highway at a rate of speed greater than is reasonable and proper, having regard to the traffic and use of the highway, or so endanger the life and limb of any person, and shall not in any event run a higher speed than 25 miles an hour; within corporate limits of cities and villages 15 miles, and on business streets 10 miles an hour. Provided, however, that said driver shall at no time drive at a rate of speed that will endanger the lives of others.

Approaching Teams or Pedestrians.—Upon approaching teams or pedestrians the driver of all motor-driven vehicles shall slow down to a speed not exceeding 10 miles an hour and give reasonable warning of his approach, and use every precaution against frightening horses and endangering the safety of others.

This attraction receives the support it deserves, it means getting others of like calibre; so make your arrangements now. Let us join with our five fellow citizens in showing our pride in our city by packing the Charlevoix Theatre to the doors and make the visit of the Sheehan Opera Company one long to be remembered.

Held Class Reunion.

Members of the C. H. S. class of 1910 held a reunion at the Hotel Charlevoix, Saturday evening. Covers were laid for twelve, and the occasion was a very enjoyable one. It takes five rats for a "count" and any less number can be refused inspection by the clerk.

Orders for the payment of the bounty are drawn on the county clerk, who in turn issues an order on the county treasurer for the amount. The law provides for no extra fees for the extra work, and it is not yet known whether the scalp of the dead rat or the whole body is necessary to complete the transaction. If the latter, the township clerks, or city clerk, will have to start a graveyard.

Corporal Punishment.

Corporal punishment formerly had a wider significance than mere whipping. Henry de Bracton, chief justiciary of England in the reign of Henry III., divided corporal punishment into two kinds, those inflicted with and without torture. The stocks and the pillory would rank as corporal punishment; also mutilations and other grim tortures which imposed not to extort confessions, but as penalties, and the branding in the hand for felony, which was not abolished until George III.'s time.

UNCEASING MISERY

Some Charlevoix Kidney Sufferers Get Little Rest or Comfort.

There is little sleep, little rest, little peace for many a sufferer from kidney trouble. Life is one continual round of pain. You can't rest at night when there's kidney backache. You suffer twinges and "stabs" of pain, annoying urinary disorders, lameness and nervousness. You can't be comfortable at work with darting pains and blinding dizzy spells. Neglect these ailments and serious troubles may follow. Begin using Dean's Kidney Pills at the first sign of disorders. Thousands have testified to their merit. Charlevoix readers will find convincing proof in the following testimony:

V. D. Keaton, 310 Rush St., Petoskey, Mich., says: "I and others of my family have taken Dean's Kidney Pills for backaches and pains in the kidneys and have had good results. My kidneys were not acting right, and obliged me to get up frequently at night. I was also annoyed by backache and pains in my limbs. I used Dean's Kidney Pills and I relieved me in every way."

stuffed not only on the inside, but the crop should also be stuffed to retain breast juices and preserve flavor. On top of the breast some pieces of raw pork should be placed, but removed about fifteen minutes before the turkey is done, so that the brown of the roasting will be uniform. The turkey should be basted every five minutes or so that the flavor of the turkey be not roasted out. It should be roasted first from the sides and turned over after gaining a nice brown and then turned on its back, the basting being continued.

Served With Cranberries.
Steamed and Baked Turkey.—Stuff the turkey as for roasting. Place it in a large pot, cover closely and steam until half tender, keeping plenty of water underneath. If the boiler has a copper bottom do not use it, but use a large enameled dishpan, which can be covered with a pan of smaller size. Put the turkey in the baking pan with water over which it was steamed and finish by baking. Chop the boiled giblets very fine and add to the gravy made by thickening the liquor in the pan. Serve with cranberries or candied sour cherries.

With Sausage Dressing.
Braised Turkey.—Take one pound each of fresh sausage meat, fresh bread crumbs, half a pound of butter two pounds of Italian chestnuts, peeled, roasted and chopped. Mix with and stuff the turkey, which is to be cooked in the usual way. Then cover the turkey with large slices of hardening pork, put it in a deep saucepan with some celery, one onion, three cloves and two bay leaves, cover tightly and place on the stove, taking care the breast gets a nice golden color. As soon as the turkey is colored on both sides remove to one side of the fire and let simmer slowly or, better yet, put in the oven, covered all the while, until done. This is called braised turkey. There will be a fine natural gravy, from which remove the fat before serving. Giblet sauce can be made if the giblet, heart and liver are cooked with the turkey and when done chopped fine and put in the gravy.

Rough on Rosebery.
Lord Rosebery has all his life been a wonderful orator, and he has probably made as many speeches as any politician living. He has told an amusing story against himself about a certain proofreader who, after he had read the proof of a particularly long speech of his lordship's, wrote at the end of it the words, "Thank heaven!" The proof was duly returned to the printer, who set up these words in type. The next day the speech was published in the newspaper with the following startling ending: "At the conclusion of his speech Lord Rosebery left for the south. Thank heaven!"—London Times.

Tantalizing Ownership.
In a French village a citizen had upon his land a part of an old building containing two very beautiful windows. He was in debt and embarrassed and eagerly closed with the offer of a rich archaeologist, who bought them. Thereupon the government inspector, hearing of the bargain, arrived just in time to stop the museum from dislodging the windows. "You cannot," he said to the villager, "sell antiquities, my man." "But, excellency, I have used the money and paid my creditors." The villager was in despair, but the official was unmovable. "That's all right," he said. "The money is safe. The windows are no longer yours. But the buyer can't move a stone of them. He can, however, come with a camp stool and sit down and look at his property as much as he likes."

Man and Labor.
Lady Russell in her volume "Swallowfield and Its Owners" points out that in 1820 the Berkshire estate came into the hands of Sir Henry Russell, who had been a friend of Dr. Johnson. It was at Russell's table that one day the doctor maintained that "no man loved labor, no man would work if he could help it." Reynolds objected and gave Pope for instance. But Pope's inspiration, said the doctor, "was the love of fame and not the love of labor." Leander swam the Hellespont, but that doesn't prove that he loved swimming."

Nervous?
"So he took you out motor riding the other evening?"
"Yes, what of it?"
"Do you think he is in love with you?"

Regular adjourned meeting of the Board was called to order by President Kane.

Trustees present, Kane, Nordrum, Hampton, Glassford and Hiller.

The report of G. W. Bissell, dean of the engineering dept. of the Michigan Agriculture College, relative to the heating system in the central and high school buildings was presented and considered.

Mr. R. W. Kane,

Charlevoix, Mich.

Dear Sir: At your request I inspected the heating plant of "old" and "new" high school buildings of your city for the purpose of informing myself as to the mechanical features of the same in order to report to you what improvements should be made to remove certain defects in construction and operation, thought by you and others to exist.

Principal Mechanical Features of the Plant.

Boilers.—Two (2) Furman cast iron sectional heaters, with 21 sq. ft. of grate in each, and rated at 6,000 sq. ft. of radiation each, or 12,000 sq. ft. of radiation of both.

Radiation, Old Building.—Approximately 2,344 sq. ft. cast-iron "direct-indirect" radiation, non-convertible into direct radiation; 148 sq. ft. of 2 column, 38-in. cast-iron "direct" radiation and 288 sq. ft. of 1-in. pipe, making a total of 2,740 sq. ft. of radiation.

New Building.—2,170 sq. feet of 38-in. "direct indirect" cast-iron radiation, convertible to direct; 292 sq. ft. of 38-in. cast-iron flue radiators; 163 sq. ft. of 32-in., 4-column cast-iron radiation and 300 sq. ft. of 1 1/2-in. pipe radiation, making a total of 3,025 sq. ft. of radiation. The grand total for both buildings is 5,765 sq. ft. of radiation of all kinds.

The Equivalent Direct Radiation for both buildings if all "direct indirect" is operated with dampers wide open to the outside is approximately 8,000 sq. ft.

Steam and Return System.—Steam is distributed by mains, placed overhead in the basements, to which the radiators are connected by single pipe risers. Automatic air valves vent each radiator. The returns are submerged or "wet" returns. Steam and return mains and risers are of ample size.

Ventilation.—In the old building fresh air is designed to enter through the "direct indirect" radiators and the foul air to escape through the floor and basement registers connected by ducts in the floors to flues in walls. In the new building, fresh air is designed to enter through the "direct indirect" radiators, but no special provision is made for the escape of the foul air except in the assembly room, where a single large register is placed on one side in a flue in an outside wall.

Operation of the System.

Information gathered from Mr. Kane, Mr. Craig, Mr. Howard and others:

1. Steam circulates quietly.
2. Air valves operate properly.
3. When radiators are full of steam all rooms are heated adequately except two north-east rooms in old building.
4. Draught in chimneys is good.
5. Considerable difficulty is found in getting buildings warmed up in the morning in severe weather.
6. Considerable difficulty is found in keeping up steam in cold weather.
7. Fires cannot be successfully banked.
8. Coal consumption is estimated at 200 tons per year.
9. The new building warms up quicker than the old.
10. Ventilation very unsatisfactory.

(Comments on Operation Conditions.)

Items 1 to 10 inclusive, indicate that the radiation surface is sufficient,—the circulation good and draught adequate.

Items 5 and 6—1 think the difficulties here mentioned are largely due to the large volume of water contained in the submerged or "wet" returns. This water is doubtless at a relatively low temperature, due to the cold air which comes in contact with the "direct indirect" radiation and imposes a heavy duty on the boilers.

Item 7. The trouble in banking fires must be due to wrong procedure.

Item 8. The coal consumption is not high for the amount of space heated and cannot be materially reduced without sacrificing some measure of the small degree of ventilation already obtained and complained of in Item 10.

Item 9.—The quicker warming up of the new building would be expected because the windows are tighter, owing to weather strips, but particularly because in this building the "direct indirect" radiators may be and doubtless is frequently and to a large extent converted into "direct" radiators. Moreover, the newness is in favor of less heat loss through the walls by leakage.

Item 10.—The ventilation cannot be expected to be satisfactory, because the means provided for supplying and removing air are wholly inadequate. Moreover, the accumulation of dust and rubbish in the radiators is conducive to impure air, through fresh.

Recommendations.

Dry Returns.—The return pipes should be reset at a level entirely above the water level in the boilers to a point in the boiler room where the condensation must be lowered to the return connections to the boilers.

In making this change the main return from each building should be dropped separately to a "return header" below the water line, say on the floor behind the boilers, and this header connected to each boiler with a check-valve in each boiler connection, protected by a gate valve between the check-valve and the boiler. There should also be a gate valve between the check-valve and the "return header" and in each return main above the "return header."

Radiators.—All "direct-indirect" radiation should be converted into "direct" radiation. In the old building this will necessitate removing the bases and dampers, supplying legs for the radiators and closing the fresh-air openings in the floors. This change will lessen an already inadequate air supply which will be secured by letting down the window from the top and by flushing the rooms from time to time by opening windows wide, exercising the pupils if need be by calisthenics while the windows are open.

Boilers.—With the changes above indicated, it would be best to observe the results, before replacing the boilers. If experience shows that the boilers do not work satisfactorily under the new conditions, a single steel boiler, brick-set, of ample size, should be installed in a separate boiler house in the school property to the west and between the two buildings.

General.

I do not feel that your heating plant will be entirely satisfactory until a mechanical ventilation system is installed. Such a system would probably cost not less than $5,000.00.

I think that the changes suggested above will improve the operation of the plant, particularly in respect to the difficulty of getting "quick action" in the morning.

The fireman will find, possibly, that the water levels in the two boilers will fluctuate more than at present, but not necessarily. It is not possible to predict what effect of the change from the "wet" to "dry" returns will be in this respect.

It would not be wise to replace one of the boilers with another of different type or size because it would be difficult to work them in "double harness."

I judge that the boilers are sound and the grate area indicates sufficient capacity for the modified requirements of the converted radiation.

I will be glad to discuss this report with you by correspondence if you wish for further information.

Respectfully submitted,

G. W. BISSELL, M. E.

Deafness Cannot Be Cured

By local applications, as they cannot reach the diseased portion of the ear. There is only one way to cure deafness, and that is by constitutional remedies. Deafness is caused by an inflamed condition of the mucous lining of the Eustachian Tube. When this tube is inflamed you have a running sound or imperfect hearing, and when it is entirely closed, deafness is the result, and unless the inflammation can be taken out and this tube restored to its normal condition, hearing will be destroyed forever; nine cases out of ten are caused by Catarrh, which is nothing but an inflamed condition of the mucous surfaces. We will give One Hundred Dollars for any case of Deafness (caused by Catarrh) that cannot be cured by Hall's Catarrh Cure. Send for Circulars free.

More Miracles Ahead.

Who can predict what the future will be, in view of what has already occurred in this generation of miracle working? New inventors, standing on the shoulders of those who so transformed things during the last half century, will doubtless learn still greater secrets of nature. Much of our worry over posterity is idle. While we are handing down many serious problems for posterity to wrestle with, we are also giving it the dearest legacy any generation has ever had. ZUDORA In the Twenty Million Dollar Mystery

By HAROLD MACGRATH

Copyright, 1914 and 1915, by Harold MacGrath

SYNOPSIS.

Zudora is left an orphan at an early age. Her father is killed in a gold mine which grows to be worth $20,000,000, and is left in the guardianship of Frank Keene, Zudora's mother's brother, who has set himself up as a Hindu mystic and is known as Hassam Ali. He decides that Zudora must die before she can have a chance to come into possession of her money, so that it may be left to him, the next of kin. Hassam Ali sees an obstacle to his scheme in the person of John Storm, a young lawyer, for whom Zudora has taken a fancy, and he commands the girl to put the man out of her mind. Zudora insists that if she cannot marry Storm she will marry no one.

"Well, well," says Hassam Ali, "solve my next twenty cases and you can marry him; fall in a single case and you must renounce him."

Zudora unravels a mystery and wins her first case—a case in which John Storm is saved from being convicted of a murder instigated by Hassam Ali himself.

Zudora and Hassam Ali visit Nabok Shana's house, where she sleeps over every one whenever Nabok attempts to marry a princess. Storm, seeking Zudora, is made a prisoner. Zudora, following Nabok, restores the princess to her original lover and saves Storm from death.

A maker of diamonds tells Hassam Ali his secret. Storm informs Zudora that his life is being attempted frequently. Storm suspects Hassam Ali. Storm is arrested for stealing the diamond maker's gems, but Zudora discovers the real thieves—a pair of mice.

The negro help employed on Storm's father's farm are fleeing because a great skeleton hand appears at night upon a hill near by. Storm is baffled in his investigation, but Zudora learns that her uncle has employed Jimmy Bolton, a half-witted man, thus to annoy Storm's parents. Zudora finds Bolton operating a big magic lantern and is attacked by him. Storm appears and saves her.

Hassam Ali asks Zudora to find a gem lost by two mysterious old men. Zudora gets a photograph of the gem and it burns in her hand. An old house is mined by Hassam Ali and the old men. Storm and Zudora are lured there and narrowly escape destruction when the house blows up.

John McWint, endeavoring to trap and kill George Smith, is killed himself, and Smith is charged with murder. Hassam Ali conspires to have John Storm meet the same fate as McWint, and he and Storm are overcome by powerful fumes. Zudora saves them, proves that McWint's own dog trapped and killed him and saves Smith from a band of lynchers.

An inventor blows up a submarine with a powerful heat ray which he sends through water. Hassam Ali sends Zudora to a photographer directly beneath the inventor's laboratory and orders the inventor to kill her. Zudora gets a warning, and her life is saved. The heat ray machine is destroyed, and the photographer, after a quarrel with Hassam Ali, is found dead in the river.

Wu Chang prevents Zudora's elopement with John Storm by hypnotizing her, and he and Hassam Ali attempt to smuggle her out of the country. This plot is frustrated by Storm.

Baird, Hassam Ali's double, falls in love with Zudora. Baird and Mme. Du Val kidnap Zudora and the Van Wick child. Storm rescues them, and Hassam Ali dies.

With Hassam Ali dead Zudora is released of her pledge to solve twenty cases. She confronts, however, the greatest mystery of all, which is the mystery of her own life, and the ambition to secure the vast fortune of $20,000,000 left to her. The great photo serial is being shown in the leading moving picture theaters by the Thanhouser Film Corporation. Among those participating are Marguerite Snow, Mary Elizabeth Purjes, James Cruze, In the new role of reporter-hero, Sidney Lincey and Frank Farrington.

On looking through her uncle's papers Zudora finds that her father left her an interest in a diamond mine, and Storm and Baird both lend assistance in trying to regain for her possession of this estate which is being appropriated by rogues under the leadership of Mme. Du Val. They plan to frighten Zudora so that she will run away. Failing, they kidnap Zudora and Howard, the mine superintendent, and put them in a private insane asylum. Howard dies, but Zudora, newly released, is rescued by Storm and his friends. Detective Hunt and Baird find the Zudora gold mine.

Mrs. Copeland's jewels are stolen, but recovered through the cleverness of Hunt and Baird. They investigate the mysteries of Mme. Du Val's house. A map of a mine is stolen from Zudora, who later is kidnapped and held prisoner. Storm rescues her, but the thieves escape with the diamonds. The diamond smugglers attempt to burn Baird alive.

CHAPTER XX.

I took two weeks for Baird's burns to heal. And Hunt sat down, as it were, and patiently waited for his friend's recovery. He could have gone forward alone, but Baird had stuck to him so loyally and devotedly that he hadn't the heart to dispense with him.

"I want to be in it the death, Hunt." "All right, my boy. It may be a bit risky walking, but I'm going to take the chance."

"It's mighty good of you. Can we bring the count of murder against them in regard to the superintendent's death?"

"That's a hard nut to crack," answered Hunt. "All I can see clearly is to lug them on the grounds of smuggling—that is, if I don't find something more vital in that desk of Mme. Du Val. Since you've been laid up I've found an odd bit of news."

"What's that?"

"This man Radcliffe knew Zudora's father."

"No?"

"Sure thing. How well and under what conditions I wasn't able to learn. Villiers' extra documents brought this bit to light. Mme. Du Val, Bruce and Radcliffe are crooks of a high order, but I confess that there are some confoundingly big holes in my net. I'm worried to death for fear they'll slip through. If I can get ten on the grounds of grand larceny and fraud—"

"Well, let's pry for that nut. It seems to me that Hassam Ali's hand-servant did not sell everything; they had something to start with and only wanted to fortify themselves. Well, here's hoping I'm up and out by the end of the week. It's going to be a grand snafu for somebody."

Three days after Baird was freed of his bandages Storm paid a visit to Zudora.

"That you will marry me inside of three months?"

dorn. She was sitting in the window seat thumbing a guller. He tossed the box of flowers into her lap. She opened it with delight.

"Are you still of the same mind?" he asked.

"Same mind for what?" she countered, knowing full well to what he referred.

"That you will marry me inside of three months?"

"I never break my word, John. Perhaps if I hadn't been so stubborn and foolish and had married you at the start all these dreadful things might never have happened to me."

"Well, you're at the end of a long lane. Hunt telephoned today that he and Baird were now ready for the war-path. And what do you suppose Hunt told me?"

"What?"

"That this man Captain Radcliffe, Mme. Du Val's admirer, once knew your father."

"Impossible!"

"It's a fact. And this may be the end explain away many confusing things. Now give me that kiss I've been waiting for ever since I came into the room."

She flew into his arms, very grateful to have a kiss so strong to shield her as she drew back from him the little book containing her father's and mother's pictures caught on a hanger.

She gave an exclamation of dismay and tried to catch the book, but she was too late to prevent the book from falling to the floor.

"It's broken!" she cried. "Oh, that's bad luck!"

"Nonsense," he replied. "A jeweler will be able to patch it up without any trouble whatever."

"Bad luck!" she reiterated. "It was my mascot, and now the charm is broken."

"Put on your things, and we'll go right down to the jeweler's and prevent the hoodoo from getting in any active work," Storm laughed. He had very few superstitions.

Half an hour later they were at the jeweler's.

"Oh, yes; that can be fixed easily enough," he declared. "The pictures will have to be taken out, though, while the locket is being repaired."

He picked up a small tool and pried the photographs from the cases and handed them to Zudora. Idly she turned them over.

"Why, what's this?" she cried, indicating a slip of paper which adhered to the back of her mother's picture.

She spread it out on the case and read aloud. "Your father's will has been left in charge of our trusted friend, Captain Radcliffe."

"Good Lord!" exclaimed Storm. "Girl, there's the key to the whole business; take my word for it. I propose you run down to Hunt's office at once. He'll wait this."

Menthol Hunt had a visitor. It was Marcus Villiers of Montana, in charge of the Zudora gold mines. He was informing the detective that he had concluded to follow his documents in case they needed his testimony, when Storm and Zudora burst into the office with their astonishing news.

"I knew it!" said Hunt jubilantly. "They seemed too confoundedly assured to suit me. And this little scrap of paper will solve the riddle. Baird is out at the villa, ready to send word to the moment those people leave the villa empty. And, by George, there goes the phone now!" He took down the receiver. "That you, Baird? Fine! They've left the villa? I'll be there inside of ten minutes. And you heard the directions? Ah, the diamond euleral! Great work, boy! I'll make you my partner for this!" Hunt turned eagerly to his visitors. "I'm off. I can't let this chance slip by. You people sit quiet until you hear from me. I've a hunch that we're going to do some roundup work this afternoon. Storm, you keep Zudora under your eye up to midnight. You never can tell. The rats may turn and bite when they learn that the game is up. Promise?"

"I promise," laughed Storm.

Hunt found Baird hiding in the pergola.

"Everything all right?"

"Yes. But you'll have to hurry. No knowing when they'll return. I judge they took some diamonds to the hospital. Looks as if they smelled a rat and were changing up. This window up there is open. Come along and I'll give you a boost. I'll stand under to give you warning in case they return before you complete the job."

Hunt began the ascent immediately. The window was unlocked. Gently the detective raised it and slid into the room. He wasted no time there, but made directly for the stairs, alert and watchful. The servants were still in the villa, and he was not desirous of running afoul of them. He reached the stairs safely and went down as soundlessly as a cat. He paused abruptly at the first landing. Some one was in the Greelan salon. It was the butler. He was clearing the little table of glasses. When he had them all on the tray he stalked out of the room.

"Maybe tomorrow he will not hold his head so high," mused Hunt, continuing his way down. He tiptoed into the salon.

The first object of his attentions was the gem vault. He succeeded in opening the panel in the column, but the vault was seemingly impregnable. He desisted and gave his attention to the table. He cast aside the cover and books and hither and thither he ran his nimble fingers, hunting for the secret combination. He was about to give up in despair when the top of the table slowly turned.

"Ah, my friends, I believe I've got you all in the hollow of my hands this trip. My, what a stack of papers! They'll make interesting reading, I'll warrant."

He went over them rapidly and finally came upon a document rather yellow with age. He opened it. He had all he could do to repress a shout of triumph. It was the will so long sought. Zudora had won her fight. He moved the cover back into place, but in his hurry did not replace the things he had taken off it, a mistake that may have cost him a good deal in the end. Some victories are only half victories, and fate was going to bring this home to him.

He tiptoed into the hall, drew up the stairs, sped through Mme. Du Val's my partner for this!" Hunt turned eagerly to his visitors. "I'm off. I can't let this chance slip by. You people sit quiet until you hear from me. I've a hunch that we're going to do some roundup work this afternoon. Storm, you keep Zudora under your eye up to midnight. You never can tell. The rats may turn and bite when they learn that the game is up. Promise?"

"I promise," laughed Storm.

Hunt found Baird hiding in the pergola.

"Everything all right?"

"Yes. But you'll have to hurry. No knowing when they'll return. I judge they took some diamonds to the hospital. Looks as if they smelled a rat and were changing up. This window up there is open. Come along and I'll give you a boost. I'll stand under to give you warning in case they return before you complete the job."

Hunt began the ascent immediately. The window was unlocked. Gently the detective raised it and slid into the room. He wasted no time there, but made directly for the stairs, alert and watchful. The servants were still in the villa, and he was not desirous of running afoul of them. He reached the stairs safely and went down as soundlessly as a cat. He paused abruptly at the first landing. Some one was in the Greelan salon. It was the butler. He was clearing the little table of glasses. When he had them all on the tray he stalked out of the room.

"Maybe tomorrow he will not hold his head so high," mused Hunt, continuing his way down. He tiptoed into the salon.

The first object of his attentions was the gem vault. He succeeded in opening the panel in the column, but the vault was seemingly impregnable. He desisted and gave his attention to the table. He cast aside the cover and books and hither and thither he ran his nimble fingers, hunting for the secret combination. He was about to give up in despair when the top of the table slowly turned.

"Ah, my friends, I believe I've got you all in the hollow of my hands this trip. My, what a stack of papers! They'll make interesting reading, I'll warrant."

He went over them rapidly and finally came upon a document rather yellow with age. He opened it. He had all he could do to repress a shout of triumph. It was the will so long sought. Zudora had won her fight. He moved the cover back into place, but in his hurry did not replace the things he had taken off it, a mistake that may have cost him a good deal in the end. Some victories are only half victories, and fate was going to bring this home to him.

Has Used a Majestic Range For Over Twelve Years

It hardly seems possible that any Range could be used this length of time, but the following sworn affidavit of R. T. Mears states that he has used a Majestic Range in his home for this length of time, and that today, as far as he can see, the range is good for many years more of service. Read what he says about the Majestic:

State of Michigan,
County of Charlevoix, ss.

R. T. Mears, being duly sworn, deposes and says that he has used a Majestic Range in his home for the past twelve years. Deponent further swears that during this time he has spent but 75c for repairs on said Majestic Range, and that today the range is in splendid condition and shows but little evidence of its long usage. Deponent further says that during a greater portion of this time he has burned coal in the above mentioned range, and that he has never had to replace any of the parts of the fire box, and that the fire back is, from all that he can see, as good as ever.

R. T. MEARS.

Subscribed to before me this 18th day of May, A. D., 1915.

L. E. BENTON, Notary Public.

My commission expires July 13, 1915.

What better recommendation can a Range be given than that above by Mr. Mears for the Majestic.

Users of the Majestic from all parts of the country give testimony of the same nature. If you want a range that is a fuel saver, easy to operate, one that will LAST, the Majestic is the one to buy.

Everybody honors a man who has the courage of his convictions. Therefore, it would not be fair, at this time, to judge William Jennings Bryan too harshly. He believes that the United States should not, under any consideration, run the slightest risk of getting actively tangled up in the war muddle, which means, in the present crisis, getting mixed up with the Germans.

There has been nothing more striking than the unanimity of public sentiment in regard to President Wilson's attitude toward the German trouble. Wilson is not a pugnacious man. But neither is he a believer in "peace at any price."

A nation may be too proud to fight, said the President recently. But he did not mean that pride can be maintained by not fighting when the necessity arises.
We do not believe that Wilson would sanction a war with Germany until every honorable preventative measure was taken. We do not believe that Germany's failure to give a definite
"yes" or "no" to the communication it is soon to receive at our hands will mean war.

It will mean, in all likelihood, that the United States will sever diplomatic relations with Germany, that the United States will, in other words, wash its hands of a people which is not playing the game fairly and squarely.

If that leads to war ultimately, it is to be regretted, and will be regretted by no one more than President Wilson.
He will have the satisfaction of knowing, however, that he did all he could,
in honor do, to prevent the conflict.

As for Mr. Bryan, he will have the satisfaction of knowing that he did all he could to prevent the conflict. But the question of honor is not so vital there.

When the sidewalk expert discourses upon the proper manner in which all things should be done, the best way to find out his ability is to set him at some task. There is a wide difference between vocal and physical achievement.

Many of our cities and villages are going to lift the lid this Fourth and allow giant firecrackers. Which is about as near to war as we care to get.

Envoys have conspired to make Secretary Bryan almost as well-known as some of the moving picture artists.

Adam went to sleep one night some thousands of years B. C. During the night one of his ribs was removed. In the morning he awoke, looked about him and exclaimed, "Hello September Morn? How are you, old girl?"

An Archbishop had preached a fine sermon on married life and its beauties.
Two old Irish women were heard coming out of the church commenting on the address. "Tis a fine sermon his Rivernence would be after giving us," said one to the other. "It is, indead," was the quick reply, "and I wish I knew as little about the matter as he does."

A colored preacher who had only a small share of this world's goods, and whose meager salary was not forthcoming on several occasions, became exasperated. At his morning service he spoke to his church members in this way: "Brederen and sisters, things is not as they should be. You must not 'spect I can preach on earth and bod's in tleben."

A negro in a South Carolina town was arrested for stealing chickens, and as he bore a rather bad reputation it was hard to secure counsel for him. At last a young lawyer who had known Rastus for a long time, took his case to the great joy of the old fellow. At his trial the judge asked, "Are you the defendant?" The old fellow was perplexed for a moment and then replied:
"No, sah, dat's de defendant, sah," pointing proudly to his counsel, "I se de man wot stole de chickens."

A husband had given his wife a sum of money and shown her how to deposit it in the bank, and how to pay her little bills thereafter by checks. About a month later she came to him in a high state of indignation. "Harry," she said, "the other day the bank sent me a note saying I had overdrawn my account and they wanted five dollars and a quarter to balance it. I sent it to them right away, but they were not satisfied.
They are still bothering me." "You say you sent the five dollars and a quarter?" "I did that very day," she said.
"That's strange," he commented, "how did you send it?" "Why, I sent a check of course."

UGLY THOUGHTS.

In wandering through your mental pleasure grounds, whenever you come upon an ugly intruder of a thought which might bloom into some poisonous emotion such as fear, envy, hate, worry, remorse, anger, and the like, there is only one right way to treat it. Pull it up like a as promptly as if it were a stinging nettle; and let some harmonious thought grow in its place.

The Steamer Illinois carried a number of excursionists from Traverse City to this city on Sunday last. The boat arrived about one o'clock, leaving at eight in the evening.

E. A. Robinson and wife of Boyne City returned home the latter part of the week, after spending several days at the home of Mrs. Robinson's parents, Mr. and Mrs. Albert Edwards.

Petoskey dedicated her new $80,000 school building on Tuesday of last week. Governor Ferris and State Superintendent of Public Instruction Keeler were the leading speakers of the evening.

Scientific Farming

WHY SOILS BECOME ACID.

Due to Lime Being Washed-Out of the Land in Humid Sections.

Now that we have discovered, says Wallace's Farmer, that clover and alfalfa will not grow on acid soils and that many failures to grow these legumes are due to acidity the question comes up, Why do soils become acid? Perhaps the best way of answering that question is by asking others: Why is the water in your well hard? Why does your teakettle become incrustated with lime?

Soil becomes acid simply because the lime is being washed out of the land in the humid section. There is naturally a limit to the amount of lime in the soil, and in process of time the amount decreases and the soil becomes acid because lacking in lime. Some soils do not become perceptibly acid until after they have been cultivated for a long time for the reason that they are based on limestone rock or are glacial soils which have a large amount of limestone in the glacial matter deposited. In the course of time, however, even these soils will become acid simply through the washing of the lime out of the soil into the wells or springs.

Support is given to this statement by the well known fact that southern soils are alkaline, the very reverse of acid. This alkalinity may not come from an excess of lime, for there are other alkalis besides lime. Sometimes soils in the southern regions become so alkaline that they will not grow alfalfa or clover; but, singularly enough, they will grow sweet clover luxuriantly. This alkalinity in southern soils, from whatever source it may arise originally, is due simply to the fact that there is not enough rainfall to wash out the alkaline substance.

Soils so excessively alkaline that they will grow nothing but alkaline resistant plants, such as alkali grass, can in time be made productive simply by washing out by irrigation and drainage.

The question of how soils become acid or lacking in alkalies of various kinds is not, however, of so much importance as how to correct this acidity in order that we may grow the legumes, particularly clover and alfalfa. The only way known as yet is by the application of lime, either in the form of ground limestone (and the finer it is ground the better) or quicklime, which is lime from which the carbon has been expelled by heat, but which is taken up by the atmosphere soon after it shakes.

HINTS FOR FARMERS.

To protect fruit trees from mice: Par. one part; tallow, three parts. Mix. Apply hot to the bark of the tree with a paint brush.

To destroy moss on trees: Paint them with quicklime whitewash mixed with wood ashes.

Grafting wax: Resin, one pound; beeswax, one pound; with tallow or lard sufficient to soften it until it can be readily applied.

Oiled cloth for hotbeds, etc.: Take four ounces flaxseed oil, two ounces lime water, one ounce white of egg, two ounces of the yolk of egg. Mix oil and lime water together at a gentle heat. The eggs beat separately. Then mix all together. Stretch canvas or cloth to be waterproofed tightly upon a frame and spread on two or three coats as it dries. Repeat until water proof.

Salve to cure foot rot in sheep: Mix four ounces best honey, two ounces burnt alum, reduced to powder, and one-half pound Armenian bole, with as much fish oil as will convert it into a salve. The honey must first be gradually dissolved, then the Armenian bole stirred in afterward. The alum and oil are added. American Veterinary.

DELEGATES WERE APPOINTED

Mrs. S. J. Alcox Named to Represent W. C. T. U. at State Convention.

The Woman's Christian Temperance Union met Friday, June 11th, with Mrs. Alcox. The meeting opened with singing, "Keep Your Heart Singing All the While." After the devotional exercises which were conducted by Mrs. Lewis and the reading of the minutes, it was moved that our president, Mrs. Alcox, be sent as delegate to the state convention which is to be held at the "Soo" June 23-27 inclusive.

The following delegates were also named to represent the local union at the coming County Convention, which it is expected will be held at East Jordan following the State Convention: Mrs. Denton, Mrs. Burns, Mrs. Campbell, Mrs. Taggart and Mrs. Lewis. Alternates, Mesdames Edwards, Wood, Parrish, Krulik and Alexander.

The topic for the day was "Flower Mission and School Gardens" and was in charge of the Flower Mission committee. The program was very good, all taking part handling their subjects in an able manner.

A quantity of flowers were brought and the committee made them up into bouquets which were sent out to the sick and "shut ins." Each bouquet was accompanied by a card with suitable sentiment from the W. C. T. U. This meeting was to have been held with Mrs. L'her, but on account of the illness of her father, it was held with Mrs. Alcox. Over thirty were present.

pondor and went out of the window just as Baird sounded the alarm. "They are coming back! That's madame's husband down the road. Hush! What luck!"

"Got everything?"

"Then let's duck while the ducking's good," suggested Baird.

They began dodging among the trees in hopes that the occupants of the limousine would not see them. But in this they failed.

Indcliffe leaped out of the limousine window.

"Hunt!" he whispered. "Hunt and that man Baird! What the devil have they been up to?"

"We can soon find out," said Mme. Du Val. "They can't have got into the house with the servants on the watch."

"You never can tell about this man Hunt," replied Indcliffe grimly. "Here we are. Come! Hurry!"

They got out of the car and ran up the steps. Upon entering they both intuitively went into the salon. Indcliffe first went to the grand vault. But nothing there had been touched. Their madame opened the top of the table.

"Gone!"

"What's gone?" demanded Indcliffe.

"Everything!" she cried passionately.

"They have cleaned out the drawer completely. Indcliffe, we are lost!"

He rang violently for the servants. But they swore earnestly that they knew absolutely nothing. And as these servants were crooks of a minor order Indcliffe was forced to believe them. But he gave them a berating over their carelessness, a berating not to be forgotten soon.

"Well," said Indcliffe, striving to calm madame, who had inexplicably burst into tears, "we've got a tidy sum of money. I've warned you a hundred times, but you would play the game to a finish. But I don't understand your tears. You know the risks we were taking. And now—flight! Thank the Lord, the night's in commission! That'll take us anywhere we care to go."

Suddenly the woman rose to her feet and dashed the tears from her eyes.

"Indcliffe, if I weep it is with tears of rage. That little chit, to leave us when we had everything. I am going to finish up this affair my way."

"And what's that?"

"I will give a reception tomorrow night."

"You are mad! A reception! They'll hold that in the Tombs!"

"Listen to me. They'll come out of curiosity, and while they are dancing or waiting for the arrival of the police, we'll slip into the tunnel and make our getaway, under their very noses. I insist upon it. I know. They will think they are playing with us, while on the contrary it is we who will play with them."

"I'm against it, but I can see that your mind is made up. Don't turn to me with reproaches if the game blows up the other way. What's the use of playing game when we're up against a proposition like this?"

"All right. I'll wire the warden at Sing Sing to order a feather bed for me. Believe me, if we don't like to-night we shan't find the opportunity tomorrow night."

"If you wish to run away do so at once," she replied coldly.

"My dear woman, you'll never be able to lose me. Let's say nothing more about it."

At 6 o'clock the old lapidary was arrested as the first move in the game. A small figure of a man in a suit was faced in the same time. "If the future diamond smugglers would have to look elsewhere."

Hunt informed Storm and Zadora what he had succeeded in doing and declared that on the morrow he would arrest Captain Radcliffe, Bruce, Mme. Du Val and their confederates.

But imagine Zadora's amazement the next morning when she received a polite invitation from Mme. Du Val to attend a tango dance!

And when Storm telephoned that he had also received one they concluded to notify Hunt. He went up in the air for a few minutes.

"What shall we do?" asked Zadora.

"Wait a minute," said Hunt; then he spoke. "Go. They are contemplating to set a trap for you, and we'll get them red handed on that count. I'll have the place surrounded by the police. They've got nerve, and I'm curious to see how far it will stretch. Tell Storm to arm himself. Baird and I will be within calling distance. With the police at hand I don't think there'll be any great risk. Give 'em rope; they'll hang themselves." Hunt hung up the telephone.

"A fine adventure!" cried Zadora. "If it was any one but Hunt I'd bow off, but the old boy knows what he's doing."

It was rather a remarkable gathering which appeared at Mme. Du Val's valdettory dance. Half of them knew that something serious was afoot, and the other half felt that something was in the air, but could not tell what.

Hunt's faint lay in his overconfidence, and in his overconfidence he forgot all about the underground passage until his quarries were suddenly found missing. He was furious. They had played with him in a manner he had been far from expecting. He had a sensation not unlike that of a nonsmoker having someone smoke puffed in his face. He called to Baird.

"They've gone into the underground passage. We have one chance in a hundred in blocking them at the old garage. Look alive!"

The two ran excitedly from the house.

They found the garage boarded up. They began battering at a window and succeeded in breaking the barricade just as the fugitives left the garage at the other end. They jumped into the empty van awaiting them just as Baird and Hunt crawled into the garage. They saw by the open trap that the birds had flown. Out of the window again they went, in time to see the van lumbering off.

"They're in that!" yelled Hunt in a strangled tone. Never in all his career had he been quite so brimfully made a fool of.

But the van galloped speed and rapidly drew away from the pursuers. Hunt had saved Zadora's millions for her, but he had lost forever his trio of precious crooks. He received this information three weeks later. Mme. Du Val's yacht had run aground on a floating mine in the English channel, and everybody on board had gone down.

Storm and Zadora were married in the Du Val villa, which really had been purchased by money belonging to her father's estate. This ended the trials of Zadora.

THE END.

How Coffee Grows in Haiti.

Coffee, the great staple product of Haiti, grows with little attention. It supplies the bulk of the revenues of the government and the meager demands of the simple peasantry of the mountains and valleys whose business it is, especially the women and children, to gather it and bring it to the seaport towns on their heads and on the backs of donkeys and horses. This plant is seen on nearly all the uplands and mountain slopes of the country, and as the product is easily portable it is brought to market from far and near in all conceivable quantities, from one or two pounds up to 200 pounds, according as it is carried on the head of a child, the back of a horse or in sacks in ox-carts. Notwithstanding that the coffee plant is so easily cultivated in all, except in small patches around the cottages, it goes on reproducing itself from fallen berries so successfully that the crop only varies from year to year through extraneous influences like a variation in the rainfall—the lack of or too abundant rain near or during the flowering season.

Cost of Advertising.

Who pays the cost of advertising? Certainly not the consumer; certainly not the retailer. Here is the real truth of the matter. Money wisely spent in advertising increases sales and profits to such an extent that sufficient capital is provided for the operation of enterprises naturally resulting from buying and manufacturing in larger quantities. The blazer the volume of trade the cheaper the relative production. As all leading advertisers know, production is cheapened in a much greater degree by advertising than is represented by the money spent in advertising. Were it otherwise there would be no use in advertising. But what is of still greater importance is that in rich with the cheapening of production there is a cheapening of the advertised article to the public.—London Strand Magazine.

Wonderful Salt Mines.

Many of the world's most famous salt mines are in operation in Galicia. Those at Wieliczka have been worked for nearly seven centuries, at one time being a principal source of revenue for the Polish kings. Galicians are not permitted to run near them lest their vibrations result in cave-ins. Within these mines is a labyrinth of salt-brown streets, staircases, restaurants, shrines and monuments. Nearly 2,000 workmen are employed in the salt mines, working in eight hour shifts. The damp, salty atmosphere seems to shorten their days, but even at that they do not appear unhappy in spite of the small wages of 20 cents a day they are paid. There are little lakes in the mines, sometimes thirty feet deep, which are navigated by ferries.

The Hurrying World.

If you see a company of pilgrims walking as if for a wager, each with his teeth set, and if you happened to ask them one after another whither they were going, and from each you were to receive the same answer—that positively they were all in such a hurry they had never found leisure to inquire into the nature of their errand—confess, my dear sir, you would be startled at the indifference they exhibited. Am I going too far if I say that this is the condition of the large majority of our fellow men and almost all our fellow women?—Robert Louis Stevenson.

Norway Shipping.

In Norway the insurance of vessels is effected by the various owners themselves, who club together and cover the risks of navigation at lower rates than are charged by underwriters. "It is interesting to notice," says Shipping Illustrated, "that in this country the shipping on the great lakes has in recent years adopted this form of insurance."—New York Telegram.

Expert Advice For the Automobile Owner

Queries and Replies Covering Matters of Importance to the Man Who Runs a Car

As soon as I go into third or high gear my car runs in a jerky manner, on the accelerator to give the engine more speed for about half a square and then go back into third or high it runs smoothly. What is the matter?

It seems most probable that the motor is missing, or at least does not run smoothly at low speeds. Adjust the spark gaps on the plugs to one thirty-second of an inch, tighten all wiring connections and look for short circuits caused by poorly insulated or bare wires.

See that the brushes on the magneto are in good condition and adjust the breaker points if they need it. There may be a temporary short circuit in the switch at times. Adjust the carburetor carefully. The air valve is for high speed and the needle valve for low. Test the compression. It may be that the valves need grinding, or there is a leakage past the pistons or the valve stem guides.

What is the best way to keep tires from sticking to the rims?

In order to keep the tires from sticking to the rims it is necessary to prevent the rusting of the rim, and this is most satisfactorily accomplished by the use of a grease. The grease is mixed into a creamy paste by adding a small percentage of gasoline. This is then applied to the rims the same as ordinary paint. The gasoline evaporates and leaves the graphite, which not only prevents rusting to a large extent, but holds the bead of the tire away from the metal of the rim.

Is it economical to use oversize tires?

Many tire makers advocate the use of oversize tires for the following reasons:

Take, for instance, a 33 by 4 tire which fits on a 32 by 3½ rim. In addition to having considerably more air capacity or cubic contents, there is naturally a little more tread, and the oversize tire is, generally speaking, of a heavier construction. The greater air capacity naturally makes more of a cushion, thus making the tire easier riding for the occupants, and, due to the advantages mentioned, caused by the fact that the tire is of heavier construction and has a greater air capacity, it will throw off strains which a tire of similar diameter and circumference would not throw off.

In addition to the above, the circumference of the oversize tire is three inches more than the 32 by 3½. This additional running surface means, of course, that the tire will revolve fewer times in making a mile than the 32 by 3½, which, everything being equal, should insure greater mileage than the smaller size tire.

What are the advantages and disadvantages of the disk friction chain drive compared with other types of transmission now more commonly used?

The advantages of the friction transmission are that it offers an infinite number of gear ratios, is silent, cheap to manufacture and simple. The disadvantages are that the friction disk must be renewed every few thousand miles—this is a small matter, but worth noting—and that the amount of horsepower that it will transmit under the conditions found in automobile design is limited. Therefore it has never been used to any extent on large cars, but has found favor on some cars of medium size and on more small cars.

Would a revival of enamel brighten up my fenders or would you advise varnish?

Varnish would probably brighten up your fenders satisfactorily. Before applying the varnish it is necessary to be particularly sure that the surface is clean and bright. The varnish then used should be the best grade of finishing varnish.

I have been having trouble getting the water to circulate through my radiator. I have put pressure on it with a hose, but the water went through only very slowly. I did this a number of times and there did not seem to be any loose sediment of any kind coming out of the radiator. I have heard that washing soda dissolved in boiling water will clean it; also boiler compound. Can you advise me regarding this?

Common washing soda dissolved in boiling water is an excellent remover of the scale that forms in the radiator. The radiator should be thoroughly flushed out with a solution consisting of about two heaping handfuls of soda to an ordinary pail of boiling water. The soda solution should be allowed to remain in the radiator for a short time, and it should then be flushed out with clear warm water.

It is inadvisable to use boiler compounds in automobile radiators unless the constituents of the compounds are well known. Some of the boiler compounds contain ingredients which corrode any metal surface with which they come in contact. The result is that, instead of merely removing the scale, the metal itself is decomposed, and in a short time the radiator becomes leaky.

What is the easiest way of locating a loose push rod?

A loose push rod can easily be located by feeling with the hand. If there is too much clearance between the stem and the top of the rod it can be ascertained by rattling the push rod, and if this is the case it should be adjusted, preferably while the motor is warm. Make the space about one one-hundredth of an inch, or the thickness of a sheet of writing paper.

If the rod is worn in the guide a certain amount of lateral movement will be noticed when force is applied to the rod by the hand.

When I put my foot on the electric starter on my car it makes a noise as though every gear were being stripped. Can you tell me the cause and how to remedy this?

It is possible that the gear teeth are worn or that the armature bearings allow play. Inspection should show whether this is so. It may be that the gears need oiling. It must not be forgotten that a starter should make a little noise, the amount depending on the design, workmanship and material.

When I change from intermediate to low or from high to low very quickly my gears go into high and low both. The car stops with a jerk and I cannot change to neutral until I get underneath the car and kick out high. When I change slowly it is all right. Is there any way of adjusting the spring tension on the clutch of this car?

Either the shifting rods are not the right length or the springs that bring them back to neutral are weak. Replace these springs, and if this does not remedy the difficulty try adjusting the lengths of the rods.

The tension of the clutch spring can be adjusted by screwing up on the nut that holds the thrust bearing in place. It is possible that this will not make the clutch hold. If it does not, then the clutch leather should be replaced. To do this it will be necessary to remove the clutch cone. Take the universal apart and then unscrew the bolt that holds the thrust bearing in place. After this the clutch spider can be removed.

What effect have moth balls on gasoline? Friends who put them in their gasoline say they get more power from their engines.

The use of moth balls will increase the power slightly, but they have a corrosive action and tend to carbontize the motor.

If I place a plate on my pistons to obtain higher compression, will it cause excessive vibration at high motor speeds?

Many owners have fastened plates to the piston tops in order to increase the compression and gain power and speed, but the construction is not advised, as the results obtained are not worth the expenditure in time and money. All depends upon the weight of the plates as to whether the vibration will be high.

Is half kerosene and half wood alcohol a good carbon remover?

Half kerosene and half wood alcohol is a good carbon remover. After using the carbon from the cylinders the oil in the crank case should be renewed in order that the lubricant will be in good condition.

Is it possible to adjust the detachable rims on a 35 by 4 wheel so that a 36 by 4½ tire can be put on? If not, what is the reason? The wheel at present will take a 34 by 3½ or 35 by 4 tire.

A 36 by 4½ tire can be put on a 35 by 4 rim because this is the oversize for that tire. It cannot, however, be put on a 34 by 3½ rim, as the oversize for this is the 35 by 4 and not 36 by 4½.

Is it advisable to wash a car with water each day?

Cars should not be washed unless it is necessary. Sometimes only wiping of the body and dusting of the cushions are needed.

My car misses in the front cylinder. It will run from one to twenty miles, and then it will miss. The spark plug gets oily and will not fire. I have put in a new plug, and it does the same thing. What is the trouble?

Evidently there is a leakage of oil, due to loose fitting rings or pistons. Remove the piston and rings and examine them carefully. Replace them so that the joints of the three rings will be equally spaced around the cylinder, as it is possible that they are all in line now.

Does a six cylinder start easier on the magneto than a four, and does not the armature on a six cylinder magneto make more revolutions to the crank shaft than does one on a four?

The magneto in a six travels one-half as fast as the crank shaft, just as it does in a four cylinder motor. The reason a six may start easier on the magneto is because in one revolution of the crank shaft there are three explosions, whereas in the four there are only two. This makes the chances of firing a charge greater in the six than in the four.

Nobody quite knows who discovered Australia. The fact has been fathered on Chinese, Malays, French, Venetians and Spaniards, while dark hints about the existence of a southern continent were made by the ancient Greeks and Romans. Possibly the secret lies hidden in the unpublished records of the Dutch East India company among the state archives at The Hague. The founding of the first British settlement at Port Jackson, near the site of Sydney, was on Jan. 26, 1788. But those earliest "settlers" were for the most part involuntary colonists, being composed mainly of transported convicts.—London Mail.

June 8, 1915.

Editor, The Charlevoix Courier, City.

Dear Sir:

I have very carefully read your article in the issue of June 2nd with reference to "Why do Charlevoix Boys and Girls Leave School?"

Beneath this caption, I was very enthusiastic in reading the article, hoping that it would throw some light on this subject, which should be all absorbing to every parent in Charlevoix, but with all due respect to your conclusion, I, as a citizen of Charlevoix, extremely interested in the schools, must differ materially with your views. I most certainly cannot agree with you that the fault lies entirely with the student himself. I have not yet arrived at a point where I must concede that our boys and girls are so extremely undependable that the responsibility for difference in school must all be laid at their door. It is doubtless true that we should all be proud of our modern school system and should admit that it is absolutely safe and reliable. However, it is not conclusive that any course of study prescribed by the Board of Education is without fault. The task in itself of prescribing a course applicable to all minds is an extremely difficult proposition. However, I would not attempt to criticize or approve the course prescribed in our schools, but, instead of condemning either the school, school system, teachers or the student, why not first go into the matter and ascertain wherein the difficulty lies.

Take the course, as prescribed by the Board of Education, analyze it and then decide whether or not it is adequate and yet moderate. Then take the execution by the corps of teachers of this course and then decide whether or not it is efficiently, properly and diplomatically presented to the pupil and if these two are perfect, then naturally, the result should be the condemnation of the student. But let's be entirely fair and by investigation locate the source of the trouble before condemning our boys and girls—they are too valuable to not be given the benefit of the doubt until proven conclusively otherwise.

Let's look into our system a little. We had a report card submitted monthly to the parent to show the standing of the student. This is an excellent plan, provided, however, these cards are accurate. But, in one instance I find a case where the card shows department 98 and during the month for which this department is shown the same student has been suspended for the balance of the term from one of his four subjects on account of bad behavior. Is or is not the parent deceived in this case?

Now a word as to the athletics of our school. Did you see the result of the Petoskey field meet? Charlevoix worse than tail-end. Why? Can we say there is no boy in Charlevoix who would not be the equal of any in Traverse City, Petoskey, Boyne City, Harbor Springs, or elsewhere, if properly trained and encouraged? Possibly the facilities for the training are not made available to the teachers, but why not the encouragement?

Now let's consider the influence of the teachers when accompanying the students on excursions. Do they consider seriously the responsibilities upon them and govern their acts accordingly? Would they criticize and condemn the student for things similar to those they possibly thoughtlessly do? The teacher's example should be and is a power over the student and our teachers should carefully consider the possible effect on the boys and girls under their care of every act of omission or commission.

I can't agree with you that ambition is a minus quantity in the makeup of our boys and girls. On the contrary, I believe that there is a greater factor of ambition in every boy and girl if they are directed and brought to look at life in a proper way and this ambition must necessarily increase with their training, both at home and in school, and you must certainly realize that ambition is not, as you indicate, an "endowment," but is a result of environment and training, and I would dislike to believe, even to any slight extent, that the decrease in enrollment is due to nothing but lack of ambition.

Therefore, would it not be wise to encourage the parent to investigate, first, the school system, second, the prescribed courses, third, the administration of the courses and fourth (but not the least) the student, and thereby arrive at the cause of the failure to make good of any boy or girl before condemning them, regardless of other conditions.

The school board, the faculty and the student are like subservient to the will of the parents collectively, but not individually, except in the latter case, and if there is a fault, is it not the duty of the parent to correct the fault, wherever it may be, rather than condemn either the Board, Faculty or Student?

Have you ever attended one of our annual school meetings? If so, how many parents did you meet there and how would the number compare with the total number of parents of children in our schools? What interest is manifested by this great majority of absent parents and would your conclusions not be that the parent gives very little consideration to the school which is and shall continue to be the basis of all hope for the future of our boys and girls?

Yours truly,
R. F. Sloan.

ECONOMICAL CAKES.

Now that food is high these simple cakes calling for only a few eggs may be made very conveniently. In some cases the eggs may be entirely omitted.

Dainty, Yet Cheap.

Oat Egg Cake.—Take one cupful sugar, two cupfuls flour, butter size of small egg, one teaspoonful baking powder, one egg, salt, three-quarters cupful milk. Cream butter and sugar, add egg well beaten and salt. Add dry ingredients and milk. Flavor.

Simple Powder Cake.—Take one and one-half cupfuls sugar, one cupful butter, cream well; three eggs well beaten three-quarters cupful milk, three cupfuls flour, one teaspoonful vanilla, one teaspoonful cream of tartar, one-half teaspoonful soda. Dissolve soda in boiling water and stir in last.

Nice With Frosting.

Light Cake.—Take a cupful of sugar, one-half cupful of butter and one egg creamed together, a pinch of salt, one half teaspoonful orange, two teaspoonfuls (seven) baking powder, one cupful of milk or hot water, two and one-half cupfuls pastry flour. Mix well and bake in a sheet pan until done. You can frost with chocolate frosting, one cupful powdered sugar, two teaspoonfuls of cocoa or grated chocolate and water to moisten so it will spread easily on cake. Use beaten eggs.

Cakes For the Kiddies.

Drop Cakes.—Take three tablespoonfuls shortening, one cupful sugar, one half cupful milk, one egg, two cupfuls flour, two teaspoonfuls baking powder and a pinch of salt. Cream the sugar and shortening together, add the milk slowly, then the well beaten egg. Sift the flour, baking powder and salt and add to the mixture. Mix well. Brush muffin tins with a little melted lard, put one spoonful of the mixture into each and press a raisin or currant into each. Bake in hot oven fifteen to twenty minutes.

The Dark Continent.

In the light of history it seems strange to call Africa a dark continent. When northern Europe was a howling wilderness and America utterly unknown to the civilized world Africa was a famous place for great cities. Egypt was the seat of riches and learning, and all the countries bordering on the Mediterranean figure largely in the pages of sacred and profane history. But a blight fell upon Africa and all the work of the past has had to be done over again. Indeed, it is only within the past quarter century that we have known anything about this wonderful country except a narrow strip around the coast. Yet Africa contains over 800,000 miles in area and has more than 200,000,000 inhabitants.—St. Louis Republic.

Woolner's Tip.

The little tip or point that often appears on the inwardly folded margin of the human ear near the top has received the name of "Woolner's tip," from the sculptor Woolner, who first reproduced it in his bust of Darwin. Other sculptors, though they must have noticed the tip, never reproduced it. Darwin held that this tip was a remnant of a wrinkle left by the coiling up of the ear and hence a proof of man's descent from lower animals.—New York World.

The Last Word.

Dix—What nonsense to say that one can't get the last word with a woman; I found it easy enough today. Dix—You don't say! How did it happen? Dix—Why, I said to a woman in the car, "Madam, have my seat."—Boston Transcript.

The Flag Pledge.

The pledge to the flag, as taken by the children of the public schools, runs as follows: "I pledge allegiance to my flag and to the country for which it stands; one nation, indivisible, with liberty and justice for all."—New York American.

The Surprising Part.

"I was surprised to learn that Bonehead had lost his mind." "What was there surprising about it?" "Why, that his friends found it out. That's what surprises me."—Houston Post.

ARLINGTON HOTEL BURNS TO GROUND

Fire Starts in Elevator Shaft Saturday Morning About 4 O'clock.

Huge Brick Chimney Only Mark Left of Former Beautiful Summer Hotel—Total Loss.

The New Arlington Hotel, located at Petoskey, one of the largest summer hotels in Northern Michigan, was completely destroyed by fire early Saturday morning during the worst early season windstorms this section has ever experienced.

The alarm was sounded about 4:40 o'clock Saturday morning and within a few minutes the fire department had straggled on the burning structure, but little could be done. The high wind drove the fire throughout the entire structure and the heat was so intense that the firemen could not remain near the building.

The fire had evidently caught around the elevator shaft on the first floor and had evidently been burning some time before discovery. The fire burned rapidly, and in less than an hour and a half the hotel was burned to the ground. On the east side, which fronts the G. R. & I. railroad tracks, the heat was so intense that it burned the telegraph wires and cables, and destroyed fine shade trees for some distance. The heat expanded the rails and caused the track to warp all out of shape, besides burning many ties.

The hotel had been opened a few days before for the purpose of cleaning, redecorating and painting, and placing it in shape for summer. A number of people who were sleeping in the annex, had narrow escapes, losing all their clothing.

The furniture and costly fittings are a total loss, the extreme heat making it impossible to save anything.

The New Arlington was erected in 1881-2 by H. O. Rose & Co., and was opened the first time to the public July 7, 1882. James R. Hayes of the Wayne Hotel, Detroit, was one of the first managers. In 1897 the hotel was purchased by S. H. Peck of Grand Rapids. Since its erection, many additions have been made to it. Everyone in this section is familiar with the location of the hotel, as it is one of the first buildings seen on approaching the city on incoming boats.

The building was partially insured, but not enough to cover the loss. It is understood that it will not be rebuilt.

Backward Spring Has Put End to Early Grasshoppers

Predicted That Millions of Them Have Been Destroyed by Cold Weather.

There has been one blessing connected with the cold backward spring. It has killed off the first colony of grasshoppers. But a few hatched out during the warm weather in April. There were millions of them in every community where the pest had gained a foothold, and had the warm weather continued, the chances are that many a farmer would have lost his crops. Last year in some localities they took young clover and alfalfa fields clean to ground, and other crops also suffered. In some cases their work was retarded by the spraying of clover and alfalfa with a Paris green solution, applied long enough before cutting to insure safety and healthfulness as hay, but there was no concerted fight against them in any locality, and when the fight stopped they were not it again, eating wheat, oats, corn, gardens, etc.

In the vicinity of Boyne Falls and in the cut-over lands of the eastern portion of the county what the natives call "hoppers" invade clover and alfalfa fields every year and many are ruined. There will be very few of them this year, but possibly enough to keep the race from dying out.

INSTALLS NEW MACHINE

George Glados of the Sugar Bowl Out After the the Popcorn Business

An ingenious automatic contraption which does everything to popcorn but eat it has been installed at the Sugar Bowl by George Glados, where it attracts much wondering admiration.

This device is among the most wonderful of the many vending machines ever disclosed to view here and is said to be an exact duplicate of machines shown at the San Francisco and San Diego expositions.

The machine is known as the "Butter Kist" automatic popcorn machine and besides being a handsomely finished piece of mechanism which would be worth looking at even if it had served no other purpose, is extremely fascinating in its evolutions. "Feed the machine and it will feed you" might be adopted as a slogan.

The machine takes care of itself, requires practically no attention and turns out what experts call the finest corn ever produced. Mr. Glados states that only the choicest corn and finest creamery butter will be used and every bag of popcorn will be labelled "Butter-Kist"—the name of this delicious concoction.

Subscribers of The Courier are Asked to Make Settlement At Once.

Too many subscribers forget that the editor is very much in need of the amount due him. His pay roll must be met every week, (and at this time of the year it is a heavy one,) and bills of the wholesale houses for supplies must be paid when due.

It is many times difficult for an editor to meet his bills, and those in arrears are responsible. If you are owing the Courier on subscription account, you are courteously asked to make an effort to settle the same at once, for we need the money due us, and this is the season of the year when collections are slow because farmers have little to market.

Nevertheless, we need what is due us and will appreciate the effort made by our patrons to meet their obligations. We have entirely too much outstanding that really belongs to us, because we have earned it long ago, and the other party has had value received and should feel himself under obligations to settle what he owes. Please settle now.

Will Pay for Reports Made.

As a result of a new law passed at the last session of the legislature, the chief of each city fire department, the president of each village and the supervisor of each township if no fire department exists, is required to report each fire to the State Fire Marshal, three days after it occurs. Under the new law the state will pay 25 cents for each report. Since the organization of the State's Fire Marshal's Department, several years ago, these reports have been furnished by the fire chiefs without remuneration. Last year 9,969 fires were reported.

THE NEW BEACH HOTEL IS A PARADISE FOR SUMMER VISITORS

Magnificent Hostelry Now Open for Season—Everything Modern Has Been Installed for Convenience of Its Guests—City of Charlevoix Indebted to Owners for Construction.

As the resort season opens from the lull of winter and spring activities, we find a new and beautiful haven of splendor, peering above all other homes for the tourists, in the new Beach Hotel. Many vacationists will welcome the days when they will arrive on their summer visit of rest and quiet pleasure. The Beach, now complete, affords the best accommodations of any hotel in Michigan, and will be a house of wonderment to those who have not been inside. You cannot imagine the beauty of this magnificent summer home until you see it as it is now, the height of an architectural ambition. The construction work was a paradise for our local workmen, who were able to find employment throughout the winter months and up to the present time.

The entire construction of the new Beach Hotel is unique and almost sensational, it being an addition annexed to the hotel whereby the new portion was extended three stories lower than the ground floor of the old building and has been built back to within seventy feet of the shores of the lake, making a seven-story building on the lake frontage at the west.

The entire three lower floors are constructed of reinforced concrete. The use of steel beams and iron columns were employed throughout the new building up to the second floor. In addition, the new electric elevator is enclosed in an absolutely fire-proof shaft, with a special steel tower the full height of the building. Macklote side walls and steel and wire glass fronts and doors are an extra precaution against fire dangers.

From the beach at the west of the building there is a winding, inviting cement walk, leading to the lower floor, which is devoted entirely for the comfort of bathers, and having a full layout of dressing rooms for both men and women, as well as shower baths, lockers and all the other accessories. There are 25 of these dressing rooms of good size, well lighted and ventilated, and absolutely sanitary, having cement floors throughout. The shower rooms are built of alabaster stone. An attendant is to be in charge of this department for the special comfort of the guests.

It should be noted also that a portion of the beach has been artistically laid out, partly sodded, and special lighting features arranged for marshmallow roasts parties and other beach sports. Many beautiful shrubs and plants are scattered about, lending a pleasing enchantment to all who make this spot their pleasure ground. The convenience of the citizens of Charlevoix has also been considered by the providing of a spacious concrete stairway, leading direct from the street down to the beautiful beach.

The floor above the beach level is planned partly for use of the guests, a large space having been set aside for club rooms and their accessories, to which the elevator service extends. These club rooms are ideal in their location, having a wonderful view of the lake and also the accommodation of a special porch fronting it. The boiler room, tank room, coal room and baggage room are also on this floor level.

The third floor above the lake level, the ceiling of which is above the sidewalk line, is devoted entirely to the pleasures and special comfort of the guests. Extending across the entire lake frontage there is a large and spacious sun-porch surrounded by windows, making it possible to open the same up all around, or to close should the inclemency of the weather make it desirable. The location of the sun-porch, dotted with windows commanding a beautiful lake view.

Directly adjoining the casino is the tea room and ten room annex, beautifully decorated and featured by a fireplace, boulder mantle, with exceptional lighting features. The stairways and elevator service extend from the tea room to all portions of the building. An entrance to the tea room has been provided from the street for the use of the public, attention being called to this by specially designed lighting standards.

The barber shop, manicure parlor and other accessories and the service portions for the tea room take up the remaining space on this floor.

From the tea room there is a wide stairway leading to the lobby and office, which is the main floor. Here one is impressed by its quiet, homelike environment, with large well-selected furnishings grouped about its large boulder fireplace. Here and there a convenient writing desk, ferns and flower boxes, located to bring about the required harmony. A space has been set aside for the dispensation of cigars and candy in charge of a competent attendant.

In one end of this lobby is the office, with all the latest devices for the convenience of its guests. Special combination letter boxes are arranged and each guest get their own mail when it arrives.

The ladies parlor adjoins the lobby on the west and opens up full width on another sun porch the same size, furnishings and finish like the sun porch on the casino floor. Leading from the lobby there are two large openings into the dining room, which is 32x110 ft., finished in white enamel, with windows its entire length on the north and opening up onto the sun porch at the west. There is also a semi-private dining-room connecting with the main dining room and an additional large dining room for the children.

The service portion and the kitchen have been entirely replanned and equipped with the most modern, up-to-date conveniences. The floors of the entire dining room, lobby, office and service portion of this floor are of asbestos, making same semi-fireproof. The former office is used as the maids and childrens dining room. The owners quarters, with private bath, are located on this floor convenient to the lobby. A new electric Fearless dish-washing machine has been added to the large kitchen as well as a modern steam table.

The office counters, cigar case and candy case are all finished with verd antique marble bases. Entire casino, tea room, lobby, office, ladies parlor, are finished in fumed oak. Arrangement is made whereby from the office, any portion of the building can be lighted by the touch of a switch. The intercommunicating telephone system installed enables one to talk to any part of the building. The adoption of the useful casement sash throughout all public portions of the building is a feature to be commended.

The main entrance porch leading up from the street is 20x50 feet, having a wide approach, with massive double columns on both sides, and is built of cement with an onestone floor. The special lighting feature, flower urns, etc., together with the entrance porch, are features which well bespeak what one is to expect in the balance of the building.

Special care was shown in the selection of the plumbing for the building, all being of the very latest, with the cost of maintenance properly considered in the purchase of high-class material. The lavatories are of vitreous china, with self-closing faucets. Special designed bronze hardware with first class locks have been used throughout. Special number plates seen in no other hotel are on the doors of all the rooms. Sanitary bases on all floors are a commendable feature.

The grand stairway, leading from the lobby to the second floor, is a decided architectural feature. Special praise should be given to the first floor landing oriel window, with its little dutch maid standing at the lighthouse, anxiously awaiting the return of the husband and father from his fishing trip. This stairway leads to the second floor above the street and is divided into well lighted and furnished sleeping quarters. The entire second, third and upper floors are devoted to sleeping quarters, all opening up onto wide, well lighted corridors, with easy access to the two main flights of stairs, elevator and fire escapes. All rooms are finished in white enamel, decorated with charming tints, harmonizing in every detail with the furnishings, etc.

All rooms are provided with running water and are properly heated and lighted, in most cases having spacious closets, private or connecting baths. All rooms have two or more large windows and are appointed with all conveniences for the comfort of the guests. In addition to the regular stairways and the elevators, four special fire exits have been arranged on each floor, located at extreme ends of the building. A special feature provided for in this hotel, is the installation of two stand pipes in each end of the building, with fire hose connection upon each floor, with hose and attachments ready for immediate use. A special fire gong is provided to arouse the guests in case of emergency. The outside fire escapes are of iron.

The entire second floor is surrounded by a wide, open veranda, the portion

Evidence of Wonderful Growth

On the 21st of this month, Herbert L. Fox received license plates numbered 94,953, meaning there were that many automobiles running in the state.

A local "speed demon" has compiled the following thoughts on the Michigan automobile business.

These cars would safely average thirteen feet over all and if they could be stood end for end touching each other on the tracks of the Pere Marquette Railroad they would make a solid mass of skillfully made machinery that would reach almost from Charlevoix to Detroit. The intricate parts, numbering millions, all being made by skilled labor, represents an enormous amount of cash paid back to labor.

FIRST DROWNING OF SEASON

Boys City Fisherman's Boat Capsizes Some Distance from Shore.

The first drowning accident on Pine Lake for the season of 1915 occurred at Boys City last week, when the boat of Henry Putvin and a man by the name of Hawkins capsized between the Von Platen and W. H. White company docks. The men were fishing and Putvin had been sitting with his bare feet hanging over the edge of the boat, when a high wave caught the craft and turned it over. As he came to the surface, Hawkins made an attempt to catch hold of him, but he fought him off. Putvin was a good swimmer and could easily have swam ashore, but became excited and lost his head entirely. It is thought his lungs partially filled when the boat overturned.

The body was found shortly after the accident in about twelve feet of water.

If the cars of Michigan were assembled into an automobile parade they would make a grand pageant over a thousand miles long if placed only fifty feet apart.

If these cars averaged 25 horse power each, which would probably be a fair estimate, they would be developing over two million and a half horse power—an amount of power so great that it would be enough to run all the manufacturing plants of many cities.

If the four rubber tires and inner tubes, averaging 32 inches, and 3 1/2 inches around, were cut in two and joined end for end, they would make a rubber path nearly a foot wide over 360 miles long, not counting 1 or 2 extra tires and tubes that most every one carries. While millions are spent in buying automobiles, millions are also spent in paying for the labor and materials from the raw materials to the finished car. This exchange of money is one thing that makes the world go round.

Deafness Cannot Be Cured

by local physicians, as they cannot reach the diseased portion of the ear. There is only one way to cure deafness, and that is by constitutional remedies. Deafness is caused by an inflamed condition of the mucous lining of the Eustachian tube. When this tube is inflamed you have a running or stuffed ear, and if the inflammation is not removed, the hearing will be destroyed forever, unless cases of ten are cured by the method of the Dr. J. C. Foley.

We will give one hundred dollars for any case of deafness cured by the Dr. J. C. Foley's Family Pills for Deafness.

DECIDE YOURSELF

The Opportunity is Here Backed by Charlevoix Testimony.

Don't take our word for it. Don't depend on a stranger's statement.

Read Charlevoix endorsement. Read the statement of Charlevoix citizens.

And decide for yourself. Here is one case of it.

Mrs. W. L. Cowan, 210 Antrim St., says: "I don't hesitate to recommend Doan's Kidney Pills, for I have had good results from them. I had severe backache and pains in my kidneys and was also annoyed by the kidney secretions. I used Doan's Kidney Pills, procured at the Ivy Drug Store, and they brought me great relief."

Mrs. Cowan is only one of many people who have gratefully endorsed Doan's Kidney Pills. If your back aches—if your kidneys bother you, don't simply ask for a kidney remedy—ask distinctly for Doan's Kidney Pills, the same that Mrs. Cowan had—the remedy backed by home testimony. 50c all stores. COMMENTING on the revival of business in the steel industry, the "basic" industry of the country, the New York World notes that "its mills were working at only about 40 per cent of capacity 5 months ago." At that time the Democrats were vigorously denying the existence of any depression. Now the mills are working at 80 per cent of capacity, and the World remarks: "The so-called war orders play only a small part in this revival. Export business is about a fifth of the total industry, and much of that is outside the munitions demand."

If the World bases its assertion on on export figures, it is utterly fallacious.

War orders made Bethlehem steel jump to 162. That company now has orders for 8,000 field guns from the English war office, and has orders up to date for $100,000,000 worth of material, and more coming.

War orders justified Hudson Maxim's statement that every "steel and powder company in the country is building additional plants."

War orders have given the Pressed Steel Car Co. a $30,000,000 contract for the delivery of shrapnel steel to Russia.
The Carnegie Steel Co. has one order for 18,000 tons of steel bars from one company which is engaged in machining shells.

Cleveland and Pittsburgh firms are figuring on 135,000 tons of steel to be used in the manufacture of shells.

Steel bars, rails, pig iron, etc., sold by the steel companies to other manufacturing companies, to be made up into munitions of war will not show up as exports. They are the raw material of shrapnel, shell, gun carriages and guns and all the thunder-bolts of war.

If the United States continues to be commiserated of the warring nations, even the peaceful ploughshare will be affected by war orders and its sale increased that new lands may be prepared for the sower.

It has been estimated that foodstuffs and other war supplies shipped to the allies since the opening of the war, aggregate $1,000,000,000 and so far as guns and ammunition are concerned the real shipments have scarcely begun. This entails the movements of huge shipments of freight to the seaboard, and that means large additional orders for steel trackage. They are not exported, but their sale was due to war orders.
The efforts of the world, and propoents of the Democracy in general, to make people believe that the depression in the United States which set in months before the war in Europe commenced, was due to the war, and on the other hand, to convince them that the revival of industry in the last few months is due to anything but the war, is too ridiculous for serious consideration.

ALL sorts of politicians are grooming themselves for a plunge into the presidential race at the next election, but excessive modesty has deterred our local lights from announcing their willingness to sacrifice themselves on the altar of their country at so much per sac.

much time at his desk as any other government official. Any other high official, he means, of course. The little fellows

All-Aboard Chestnut Specials

The quick-witted son of a farmer was in the habit of delivering butter and eggs regularly every morning at the summer residence of a prominent minister of the Gospel. The minister, who delighted in early morning walks in his garden, became interested in the boy, and enjoyed quizzing him.

"Good morning, my lad, he said, "I will give you an orange if you will tell me where God is!"

"Thank you, sir," replied the boy,
"I'll give you two oranges if you will tell me where He is not!"

The boy had him cornered.

There was a colored preacher who, when calling on one of his brethren propounded the following question, "when yo' hab a quah! wid yo' wife, do she pout and sulk or do she talk back, Brudder Rastus?" "She talks back, sah.
She not only talks back but she talks front'ards and sideways and acrost and endways, diag'nal and roun' and roun' an' den she come all de way back an' repeats herself. Aw, yessah, she sho talks back."

A young minister unexpectedly called on to address a Sunday school, asked, to gain time: "Children, what shall I talk about?" A little girl on the front seat who was in the habit of reciting at entertainments, had committed to memory several declamations so that she was always prepared for any occasion.
Sympathy and interest alone shown in her face as she held up her hand and in a shrill voice said, "What do you know best."

An old couple from the backwoods were taking their first ride on the steam cars. The train was making fast time through a hilly country, and the old lady held her breath while crossing a high piece of trestle, and then turning to her husband, exclaimed in a high voice, "Thank God, we have lit."

A visitor from the great metropolis had been sightseeing in the Quaker
City with a neighbor of that place.
"People don't die very often over here, do they?" he remarked. "No, only once," replied the Quaker.

Clarence Hatzfeld, of Chicago, was the architect and has had entire charge of the construction of the building from the start to the completion, having come from Chicago often to closely watch every detail in the work. Mr.
Hatzfeld is a clever designer as well as an expert architect, and upon him rests the honors in the selection of the beautiful decorations, lights and fixtures, all of which he laid plans for. His ardent work is a monument to Charlevoix adding to our city an artistic building, the gem of all northern resorts.

John Curtis of this city, had complete charge of the construction work and deserves marked honors for the manner in which he followed the course of the construction with unceasing and untiring efforts for success upon his first big job of contracting.

The manicure parlor will be in charge of Mrs. Lillie Hill of Kalamazoo, a woman highly recommended in this line of work. Miss Dorothy Wood of Bloomington, Ill., will have charge of the decorations and piano music. Miss Helen Armstrong of this city, a graduate of has been porter for the past ten years, will officiate in that capacity again this season.

In connection with the tea room, which is to be a main feature in the Beach Hotel enterprise, a delicatessen will be run for the special convenience of the cottagers. The cottage feature is fast becoming popular in Charlevoix and the Bakers are now ready to handle their wants in a most satisfying manner.

Planned as it, over the slope of the beach, extending up above the shores of Lake Michigan, seven stories high, with continuous balconies on all the lower five floors, and smaller private balconies on the two upper floors, the hotel makes a most wonderful impression. The lighting of the exterior makes it possible, when all lights are turned on, to see the hotel far out into the lake, and is bound to be a picture long to be remembered by those leaving Charlevoix by boat. The love of the beautiful, which is so strongly characteristic of the owners, is evidenced on all sides in all portions of the building, and in all its surroundings, they not even overlooking the artistic touches in the distribution of flower urns on the streets leading to the hotel, and immediately adjacent to same, which has transformed the entire district almost into a public garden.

The entire hotel, from its approaches, throughout its entire exterior and interior, should be considered as a triumph of beauty and an honor to our city, the owners, builders, and Northern Michigan as a whole.

MIRTH CARMEN

Primadonna of the Shiehan Opera Co Which Comes To The Charlevoix Theatre June 30.

Mirth, Carmen's chief charm, lies in her candor. A much traveled young woman, she has gone through this vale of tears—and they are very large, expressive eyes—wide open so she can see much, both in the way of things and people. It has been her rare good fortune to have reached the topmost rung of the operatic ladder—a rare good fortune to have done this as a native born American.

From her great store of knowledge, two big facts have crystallized and become Mirth Carmen's creed of conduct:

There will be a dance at the home of Leonard D'Ooge in Hayes on the evening of July 3d. All are cordially invited to attend.

Miss Mable Poole returned Monday, to her position as telephone operator in Chicago, after a two week's visit at the home of her parents.

Boysie City will celebrate the 4th of July on Monday July 5th. Preparations are under way for one of the biggest days in the history of the town.

The Misses Cora Driggett, Ruby Hooker and Bessie Allen, all graduates from this year's Normal class, left Wednesday for Ypsilanti, where they will attend the summer session of the state normal school.

The last word in motion photographic art comes to the Majestic Theatre, June 28th. Gabrielle d'Annunzio, who is unquestionably Italy's foremost dramatist wrote and personally staged the photo spectacle "Cabiria." Experts in motion photography predict a new epoch with the introduction of this remarkable film which is a historical vision of the third century B. C., immediately after the close of the first Punic war. It has never been equaled for regal splendor and barbaric magnificence. Its cast is composed of the best-known players of Rome and ensembles, mobs and armies numbering over seven thousand people.

d'Annunzio has taken as a basis of this story the strife between Carthage and the Romans, at the time Hannibal took command of the Carthaginian forces, and surprised his antagonists by crossing the Alps with his army. The romance of "Cabiria" is fictional but the action and main facts are historical. "Cabiria," the title part is the principal character of the scenario; the name means "one rescued from the flames" and "Cabiria" an infant child, taken prisoner during the eruption of Mt. Aetna is sold into slavery. The High Priest of the Temple of Moloch was the purchaser and the infant is kept with others until the time arrives for her to be sacrificed to Moloch, whom the Carthaginians worshipped as the God of Fire. She is saved by a young Roman, Flavius and her experience and sensational escape with the assistance of a veritable Hercules, form the nucleus of the plot.

ADVANCE FIRST STANDARD SCHOOL

Has the Honor of Being the First One In Charlevoix County.

I. H. Millard Tells of Work Accomplished by People of District.

The honor of being the first Standard School in Charlevoix county goes to the Advance school in Eveline township.

The people of this district have awakened to the fact that pleasant surroundings are necessary for the proper development of growing boys and girls as for the production of milk in the dairy herd.

The teacher, Ernest Peaslee, started the movement and was ably seconded by the Ladies' Improvement Society, and during the year they raised and expended over $70 aside from what the board expended. They have a new organ, a drinking fountain, a ventilating system, a splendid library, new adjustable seats, plenty of good slate blackboards, five extra windows with splendid blinds for controlling the light, and other necessary equipment.

The grounds have been plowed and will be cultivated and seeded this summer. They were ready for inspection in April, but Mr. Ottwell of the state department was unable to get here sooner on account of the size of the territory he has to cover.

On Tuesday, June 22, the people of the neighborhood to the number of about 75 met at the school house and the teacher took charge of the meeting after one of the nicest picnic dinners that the writer has been privileged to partake of. A literary program was given by the pupils of the school and was appreciated by all present. It was the writer's pleasure to present, in behalf of the Department of Public Instruction, a beautiful Standard Plate which was then placed in its proper place on the building.

Two other schools in the county have been passed as standard and plates will be presented this week. They are Nos. 1 and 7th, Chandler twp., No. 1, Bay, No. 4, Hayes, Nos. 3 and 4, Hudson and No. 5, Melrose have also been mentioned by the department as being within easy reach of the standard list, and it only remains for some of the patrons of these districts to get busy and express a willingness to expend a very little money in repairs and equipment, to put them on the list.

The Advance school required a lot of improvements and the expenditure of quite a sum of money, but it has been a long time since I have seen a prouder bunch of people than those assembled and the picnic on the twenty-second. To Mr. Peaslee, more than any other particular individual, belongs the credit. He directed all of the work and did a goodly portion of it himself for he is a workman as well as a teacher. The Three Bells school has secured the services of Mr. Peaslee for the next year and they are now planning to make that school standard.

Let the good work go on.

Purchase Salmon Canneries.

Four salmon canneries in southeastern Alaska and Washington have been purchased by the Booth Fisheries Company for $841,228. Two of the new plants operate on Puget sound, and two on the Alaskan coast. The acquisition will result in the increase of the company's salmon output 50 per cent.

RUN OVER BY HEAVY WAGON

Little Iris Dodd Has Miraculous Escape From Instant Death.

Fell Under Wheels of Wagon When She Went to Meet Her Father.

Last Wednesday afternoon, Iris, the six year old daughter of Earl Dodd met with a serious accident from which she miraculously escaped death.

As Mr. Dodd drove into the yard his two small children ran to meet him. He told them not to climb onto the wagon, but little Iris, however did not heed the warning and climbed on the back wheel, only to fall under it.

Mr. Dodd looked around and saw the child just before the wheel passed over her and knowing he could not stop the horses in time to prevent the accident, whipped the horses, partly lifting the wagon over the child's body.

Dr. Armstrong was hurriedly called and after a careful examination, discovered the wheel had passed over her hips and that no bones were broken. The child seems to be rapidly recovering from the results of the accident.

The wagon was loaded with 2x8 timbers, 72 in all, making a weight of over three tons. It is hard to believe the child could survive after having such a heavy weight pass over her.

HAD NARROW ESCAPE.

Well-Known North Bay Farmer Injured in Runaway Accident.

Rollo Long, well-known North Bay farmer, came near being seriously injured Wednesday of last week, near Boyne City when his team ran away. He was hauling a load of building material for the new house at the Starmer farm and part of the load slipped off, frightening the horses.

Mr. Long was thrown off the wagon and one rear wheel passed over his right leg just above the ankle. He was bruised and cut in many places but managed to turn the horses from the main road into a fence. Such a small item as a fence failed to stop them, however, for they broke this down and ran into the yard at the Beulah home. Here they leaped over a five-foot cement wall and ran down across a field. The load was scattered in every direction but neither the horses or the wagon were injured.

While Mr. Long's injuries will not keep him from work they are still painful and disagreeable.—Petoskey Evening News.

QUESTION CLEARED UP.

Charlevoix Readers Can no longer Doubt the Evidence.

Again and again we have read of strangers in distant towns who have been cured by this or that medicine. But Charlevoix's pertinent question has always been "Has any one here in Charlevoix been cured?" The word of a stranger living a hundred miles away may be true, but it cannot have the same weight with us as the word of our own citizen, whom we know and respect, and whose evidence we can so easily prove.

Bert Beaudoin, 328 Bridge st., Charlevoix, says: "I was bothered old and on for several months by my kidneys. The kidney secretions were irregular in passage and I suffered from severe back-aches and pains in my loins. I used a box of Doan's Kidney Pills, obtained at the Ivy Drug Store, and they brought fine results. I am now free from the aches and pains and my kidneys are normal."

"I suffered a long time with a very weak back," writes Fred Smith, 325 Main St., Green Bay, Wis. "A few boxes of Foley Kidney Pills completely relieved me of all soreness and pain in the back, and now I am as strong and well as ever."

One cannot help becoming nervous and feeling tired and worn out when the kidneys fail to filter and throw out of the system the poisonous waste matter that causes kidney troubles and bladder ailments.

Foley Kidney Pills get right at the source of trouble. They invigorate the kidneys to healthy action and when the kidneys properly perform their functions the poisonous waste matter is eliminated from the system.

HANDLING PURE BRED MARES ON THE FARM

It costs no more to feed a blooded animal than a grade, and the better mares, while doing all the farm work, will at the same time bring in a good income, writes a correspondent of Orange Judd Farmer.

In the winter time I let my mares rough it. They ran in stalk fields and on blue grass pasture, and in the spring I take them in and feed them and work them up until near the time of foaling. I think they should have a rest for awhile and then be put at light work and feed.

If you are able to buy two pure bred mares instead of one, do so. It frequently happens that one is a regular breeder and the other is not so good. The work of handling and taking care of two like animals is not much greater than for one. Besides, they will keep one another company in the pasture with their foals.

We believe in working the pure bred mares and having them help do our spring work. Then we turn them out on pasture with their foals. For the heavier work, however, such as hauling grates to market, eight or nine miles, making two trips a day, and cutting twenty acres of grain a day with four animals, I think a farmer should have a team or two of good, big, strong

It is the general impression among horsemen that the Clydesdale breed owes its present day characteristics mainly to selection in breeding and the infusion at the start of some Flemish blood. It really stands today as one of our most ancient breeds of horses, and though, as such, it shows rather more strongly than most other breeds traces of the form of its ancient forbears and the use to which they were put, these traces are not without their value, and it stands as one of the best of our draft breeds. The horse shown is a Clydesdale grade.

mares or geldings. No brood mare, whether mongrel, grade or pure bred, can give a good account of herself under such a severe strain and hardship. Give the pure bred mare plenty of exercise, pure water, good feed, clean outs, a little corn, sweet hay, no moldy, musty feed of any kind. In the winter we allow our mares some oat straw and at times the run of the stalk field. We like to have them foal in May or the first half of June, which gives one the use of the animals through most of the spring work.

We use all possible precaution to disinfecting and having the stall clean before and after foaling. Spare no effort in this work. Better still, if the weather is warm and pleasant enough, let the mare foal out on the grass in the pasture. This is very necessary in order to guard against navel infection, from which more colts die every year than from anything else or all other ailments combined.

Anti-hog Cholera Serum Wine.

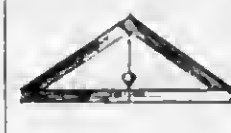

Eight thousand "hogs" have recently been vaccinated in Greene county, O., where there have been seventy-one outbreaks of hog cholera affecting 782 hogs. Of the hogs which were vaccinated while still well, only a fraction of 1 per cent was lost. Of the total vaccinated, 94.3 per cent were saved.—United States Department of Agriculture.

When Lambs Get Chilled.

If a lamb is chilled take it to a warm place and dip it in water as hot as you can comfortably bear your hand. Keep it in the water, rubbing it for about five minutes; then wrap it in hot flannel and rub it dry. Return it to the mother as soon as possible for nourishment.—Farm Journal.

A Plumb Bob Level.

Some years ago I needed a level, but could not secure one within ten miles, says a correspondent of Farm and Fireside, from which this article and the picture are produced. The one I constructed as a makeshift answered the purpose so well that I finished the whole job by it.

Take a piece of board having a straight edge. To this fasten two other pieces, forming a triangle. Now with a square find the point on the base from which a line leaving it at right angles exactly strikes the point where the side pieces meet. From this point suspend a plumb bob and your level is complete. I used an old peg top as a plumb bob, but almost any little weight will do.

How to Load a Wagon.

In loading a wagon place the load evenly over the front and hind wheels. If any difference is made it should be on the hind wheels. They are larger and hence do not sink in as deep as the smaller front wheels. The fact that the load is farther from the team does not increase the draft on the wagon. When the team is hitched to something dragging on the ground then the nearer the team is to the load the lighter the pull. This is due to the fact that the nearer the team is the more the pull will be upward, thus helping to reduce the friction between the load and the ground.

THE SPIRIT OF INDEPENDENCE DAY

Enrichetta And the Flag

A Story For Independence Day Reading.

WHEN Mrs. Morland returned home from Florence the three most valued possessions brought by her from the City of Flowers were a wonderful old ivory crucifix, a silver candlestick, which might have been designed by Bevenuto Cellini, and—Enrichetta. Enrichetta had been a "femuriera" in the pension on the Via Pandolina. She was so beautiful that Mrs. Morland, whose own face was plain, was never tired of looking at her, and when she said "Pellece notte" ("Good night") upon leaving the American woman's room at night Enrichetta's voice was as soft as the first trembling trill of the nightingale.

"I must take Enrichetta home with me," said Mrs. Morland, who, blessed with plenty of this world's goods, was in the habit of gratifying every caprice. And it was not difficult to persuade the girl to sail for that far-off land over the sea, especially as the kind American lady had promised to bring her home again within two years should she become dissatisfied. This thought comforted Enrichetta many a winter night when she sat at the window of her little room looking out upon the snow and sleet and tearfully thinking of her native skies. She was hungry for the companionship of her own people and pined for the sound of her own musical language, which she heard from none but her mistress, who spoke to her with a decided American accent.

A devout Roman Catholic, Enrichetta attended the nearest church, but there she met only Irish and Americans, and she missed the sweet face of the Madonna Addolorata in her church at home, a face always associated in her mind with the half-remembered countenance of her own mother.

But when fine weather came and the grass was green, and the birds were singing in a vegetable vander stopped at the back door one day and spoke to Enrichetta in Italian. The two talked happily together, and he told her of a church, where their own people worshipped, and from that day the great city was less lonely for the young Florentine.

At that church she met Luigi, who Enrichetta thought, had the kindest eyes in the world and whose teeth were as white as milk. Luigi owned a fruit store and had laid by 10,000 lire, which would be considered a fortune by his friends and acquaintances on the other side.

The Fourth of July was coming, which Luigi explained was a great day in America and was always celebrated with fireworks after the manner of San Giovanni's day in Italy, only with a far greater amount of boom and snap and crash. He told her he would come in the evening and take her to a certain spot on the lake front where there was sure to be a splendid display of rockets.

Enrichetta sang merrily as she went about her work and then began to think seriously of what she would wear on that night, so sacred to this great United States. She would have a new waist, something gay and showy; then she belabored her of the contents of a box given to her on housecleaning time by her mistress. "Here, Enrichetta," the latter had said, "this box is marked 'Olds and Knols.' You may have it; I want to get it out of my way."

In the bottom of the box, beneath scraps and remnants of goods, was a silk lining about three yards long. It was torn at the end, and there were a few round holes in it which the mistress supposed accounted for the fact that the signora no longer puts

it. It was the flag of this country, which, now that she knew Luigi, the girl secretly believed would be her own country forevermore, and it was prettier than the bandiers of Italy.

Enrichetta decided to make a waist of the flag to wear on the Fourth of July. Being very deft with scissors and needle, she managed to escape the holes and flaws in cutting out the garment, and the result of her labor was a rather startling red and white waist, with a silver starred blue yoke trimmed with gold fringe.

Early the morning of the Fourth Mrs. Morland began the search for the silk flag, which when she was at home on that day always occupied the place of honor over the front door. She valued this banner highly; she had inherited it from her father; it had waved above the glorious field of Gettysburg, where it had been pierced by shot and shell. But now it could not be found, and thinking it must have been stolen Mrs. Morland gave up the search in despair.

The other servants were either out or engaged in another part of the house when Enrichetta came downstairs that evening to answer Luigi's ring at the rear door. The girl wore her gorgeous waist, with a dark blue woolen skirt. Her cheeks were as red as the coral rings twinkling in her small ears, and her large dark eyes were sparkling with happiness.

Mrs. Morland happened to enter the kitchen at the moment of Luigi's arrival. "Why, Enrichetta, how patriotic you are!" she exclaimed, noting the shimmering stars. Then she frowned and asked sternly, "Where did you get that waist?"

"I made it out of the flag the signora so kindly gave me," replied Enrichetta in an unsteady voice, for she was frightened at Mrs. Morland's unfamiliar harshness.

"The flag that I gave you! Why, I would not have taken a small fortune for it! And you were slipping out of the house to prevent my seeing you! Oh, Enrichetta, I was so fond of you I would not have believed that you were a thief!"

"A thief, madama?" cried Luigi, throwing back his head and knitting his straight black brows.

Enrichetta burst into tears. "How can the signora be so cruel?" she moaned. "She will remember that she gave it to me in the bottom of a box. I thought she no longer cared for it because of the torn places and the holes."

"Why, girl, the holes and the torn places made it more valuable! But I now understand how it happened. It was not your fault, but mine. I should have examined the box."

"I will take off the waist at once," said Enrichetta, "but, alas, I never can replace the bandiera as it was."

By this time Mrs. Morland had recovered her usual severity. "There, child, it can't be helped now," she said; "run along and enjoy yourself and wear the patriotic waist if it pleases you. There is a stiff breeze coming up from the lake, but the silk is thick and will protect you from the chill air. And," she added, smiling, "to protect foreigners is one of the missions of the stars and stripes."—Cornelia Baker.

THE SPIRIT OF PATRIOTISM.

IN vain do we trace magnanimity and heroism, in vain do we trace a descent from the worthies of the earth, if we inherit not the spirit of our ancestors. Who is he who boasts of his patriotism? Has he vanquished luxury and subdued the worldly pride of his heart? Is he not yet drinking the poisonous draft and rolling the sweet morsel under his tongue? He who cannot conquer the little vanity of his heart and deny the delicacy of a debauched palate, let him lay his hand upon his mouth and his mouth in the dust.—Joseph Quincy, 1768.

The KITCHEN CUPBOARD

PUMPKIN PIES.

THE pumpkin pie is the one that holds popular favor at the Thanksgiving season. Many cooks make the mistake of putting too much pumpkin into the custard for the filling. Pumpkin custard is especially delicious.

Make the Crust Thick.

Thick Pumpkin Pie.—This pumpkin pie should be at least one inch thick. For the pie take two-thirds of a cupful of sugar, a little nutmeg, half a teaspoonful each of salt and cinnamon stir into two cupfuls of sieved pumpkin and add two well beaten eggs and a scanty pint of milk. Line a pie plate with crust, pour in the filling and bake slowly for one hour, taking care that the heat is not so intense as to burn the pie.

Economy Pastry.

Eggless Pumpkin Pie.—Cook and mash the pumpkin squeeze through colander and dry out in oven. To a quart of sifted pumpkin add three cupfuls of boiling milk. Sweeten with two thirds of a cupful of molasses and half a cupful of brown sugar, add half a teaspoonful of salt, half a teaspoonful of ginger and a little vanilla. Turn into tin lined with good rich crust and put into hot oven. Allow fire to be brisk for five minutes, then lower heat and bake slowly for an hour.

For the Company Dinner.

Sweet Pumpkin Pie.—Stirrah enough cooked pumpkin to make one and one half cupfuls, add to it a fourth of a cupful of molasses, half a teaspoonful of salt, a third of a teaspoonful of ginger, a little nutmeg and cinnamon. Beat one egg very light. Add a fourth of a cupful of light brown sugar and beat thoroughly. Add to the pumpkin mixture. Lastly add two cupfuls of rich milk, beat thoroughly and turn into pie tin lined with rich pie crust. Pumpkin should always be put into very hot oven for five minutes to bake the crust rapidly. Then the oven must be cooled and pie baked slowly to allow filling to become rich and brown.

MODERN METHOD OF CATTLE FEEDING

I selected in my own neighborhood a number of cows which I keep all the year, writes an Illinois breeder in the American Agriculturist. While these cows are not the best individuals, they are a fair sample of the cows found in the corn belt. I use a pure bred Angus bull on these grade cows for my feeders, because in my opinion I get a better type of calves all black, hornless, docile and excellent feeders.

It has been said that a pure bred bull is half the herd, and this is especially true when a pure bred sire is used on grade cows. It does not make much difference which breed the sire is chosen from. Whether he be Angus, Shorthorn or Hereford he should be a pure bred and characteristic of the breed which he represents.

When a farmer keeps on hand from twelve to sixteen head of cows with the same number of yearlings and suckling calves there is naturally quite a little expense involved in the way of pasture, grain, hay and other roughage. When land is selling for $200 to $250 an acre it seems almost a losing proposition to raise cattle, especially when corn is bringing sixty cents a bushel, and selling at 90 cents a bushel. However, the following method has proved very successful with me: The calves are allowed to run with the cows during the summer and early fall months, then they are weaned.

The Aberdeen-Angus are the cattle of the Scottish highlanders. It is believed that they originated some 300 hundred years ago from a cross between the Challoway and the red Durham. These cattle when well fed are always smooth and ready for slaughter. They make fine baby beef and bring more price at the International Live Stock show at Chicago in recent years than any other breed. The illustration shows a pure bred Angus bull.

ed and put by themselves on pasture. Later in the season they are allowed the run of a stock field and put up at night and fed a ration of grain and silage. In this way they are kept in a thrifty and growing condition during the winter.

The next spring, about the middle of May, they are turned out on pasture for the summer. In the early fall they are put in the feed lot and fed for the market. As soon as the young calves are weaned the majority of the cows are dried up, and are carried through the fall and winter on pasture and the stalk fields. They also get such roughage as is raised on any corn belt farm. To keep a cow a year just for her milk necessitates the raising of a calf of the right beef type. If a cow falls below my standard she is disposed of and another procured in

Has Used a Majestic Range For Over Twelve Years

It hardly seems possible that any Range could be used this length of time, but the following sworn affidavit of R. T. Mears states that he has used a Majestic Range in his home for this length of time, and that today, as far as he can see, the range is good for many years' more of service. Read what he says about the Majestic:

State of Michigan,
County of Charlevoix, ss.

R. T. Mears, being duly sworn, deposes and says that he has used a Majestic Range in his home for the past twelve years. Deponent further swears that during this time he has spent but 75c for repairs on said Majestic Range, and that today the range is in splendid condition and shows but little evidence of its long usage. Deponent further says that during a greater portion of this time he has burned coal in the above mentioned range, and that he has never had to replace any of the parts of the fire box, and that the fire back is, from all that he can see, as good as ever.

R. T. MEARS.

My commission expires July 13, 1915.

What better recommendation can a Range be given than that above by Mr. Mears for the Majestic.

Users of the Majestic from all parts of the country give testimony of the same nature. If you want a range that is a fuel saver, easy to operate, one that will LAST, the Majestic is the one to buy.

THE charge of inexcusable carelessness in the enactment of an important statute has again been sustained against the Democratic administration.

The error occurs in a statute directly affecting the safety of human lives. The "Safety at Sea Act," passed to "promote the welfare of American seamen," and to prevent, if possible, a repetition of the Titanic steamship disaster with its appalling loss of life, a little over three years ago, failed to clearly fix the date it should become effective. Two different dates were named for enforcement, one four months later than the other.

Section 14 of the act revises the regulations regarding lifeboats, life rafts, life belts and similar equipment for preventing loss of life in case of accident, and declares that the regulations must be enforced and obeyed on and after "July 1, 1915," on steamers navigating the ocean or any lake or sound of the United States.

Section 18 of the same act contains a squarely contradictory provision declaring that this act shall take effect, as to all vessels of the United States, "eight months after its passage."

Two conflicting opinions have been rendered by legal officers of the administration on this statute. The Solicitor of the Department of Commerce first found "July 1, 1915," as the date congress intended the law to operate as American vessels. The attorney general reverses this opinion and ruled that congress intended "Nov. 4, 1915," as the time for enforcement.

When the Titanic sank and carried so many hundreds to an ocean grave, the world was shocked to discover the inadequacy of the laws enforcement of which would have greatly reduced the number of fatalities. There was a universal demand for the immediate enactment of better laws to safeguard ocean travel.

It is shocking now to find that in the statute enacted in response to this demand there is an error that leaves in doubt the time of its operation, and has made it necessary for an individual, rather than Congress, to determine when the law shall be enforced.

A blunder of this type is monumental. In all parliamentary procedure it is elementary that a definite date for the enforcement of a law is practically as important as the signature of the president. Combined, the two constitute the electric current which permits the machinery of the law to be set in motion.

Many members of Congress and others familiar with the history of this "Safety at Sea Act," believed it would go into effect July 1, and are surprised and disappointed that, under the opinion of the Attorney General, it will not begin to operate until November, after the season for water travel is over.

In most instances a failure to fix definitely the date a statute shall be enforced involves only financial considerations. But in a law designed for the protection of humanity, lives are at stake and the necessity for the highest degree of care, becomes imperative.

THE Democratic convention of 1916 will have to perform some remarkable rhetorical stunts if it works a "Made-in-America" policy into its free trade platform.

It is predicted that Michigan will have the largest crops in its history. Everything seems to break for the farmer. Bigger crops and lower priced touring cars in one year.

THE first act of some young men on returning from college is to let other people know how little they know.

School Census Closed.

The report shows a decrease of 21 over the census of 1914.

All-Aboard Chestnut Specials

The fresh spring breeze was blowing thru the open windows of the school room and George Washington was the momentous question in hand. "Why do you think George Washington was the first man?" asked the teacher. "Because he was first in war, first in peace, and first in the hearts of his countrymen," said a small boy. Another boy raised his hand. "Well, Henry, what can you tell us about the first man?" said the teacher. "Don't know his name," answered Henry. "But I know George Washington was not the first man, 'cause my history says he married a widow, so there must have been another man 'way ahead of him."

Never before had there been such a commotion in the little home, and the most widely excited person was the sister of the young mother who had just presented twins to her husband. Off she rushed to the post office for stamps to spread the glad tidings abroad. "Stamps, please," she said as she flung down her money. "How many, Miss?" asked the clerk. "Two," she cried joyfully. "What kind?" "A boy and a girl."

A small hen-pecked worried-looking man was about to take an examination for life insurance. "You don't dissipate, do you?" asked the physician, as he made ready for the test. "Not a fast liver or anything of the sort?" The little man hesitated a moment, looked a bit frightened, then replied in a small, piping voice: "I sometimes chew a little gum."

It is funny but it is a fact that most of the men who use perfect grammar are earning $20 per week, and most of the men who say "them things" and other bush language expressions own their own homes and have a substantial bank account.

Three-year old Dorris stood in the doorway watching the rooster crow. "Mamma," she said, "I don't see why an old rooster wants to spank himself and then cry about it."

Preceding the regular circus performance the new spectacle of "Solomon and the Queen of Sheba" will be enacted on the largest stage in the world. GERMS IN THE MOUTH.

Using Paper as a Toothpick is a Dangerous Practice.

One of the most dangerous little tricks that men and women do is to take a bit of paper, torn from an envelope or newspaper, and try to run it between the teeth to remove some little particle of food that the tongue feels. If you want to be sure of trouble with your gums continue this practice, and sooner or later—rather sooner than later—you will secure a splendid cause of infection of the gums that will send you to the dentist in a hurry, and may cause more than one sleepless night.

The bit of paper used in this way, introduced edgewise between the teeth, is worse than any toothpick, or other instrument, for many reasons. In the first place the sharp edge of the paper is most apt to make a cut in the gum, and in so doing it is almost sure to carry into the circulation at least some of the many germs clinging to it. Again, the chemicals used in the making of paper are far from edible, but in addition to these the newspaper may have picked up a variety of germs from those who have handled it or from the dust that has blown upon it while exposed for sale.

The flap of the envelope, which is so "handy" a bit to use for the teeth, may have touched the lips of some one with tonsillitis, or even with tuberculosis.—New York American.

ROMANCE OF FLOWERS.

A Blossom Changed the Roving Camp Into a Permanent Home.

The difference between a home and a camp is a blossom. Until flowers were planted about the abode of men, until blossoms were cultivated, there were no permanent homes, no fixed places of abode. Tents were struck and a new location sought. Attachments were not formed for localities. We were a wandering, shiftless, care-free lot until a woman trudged in from the thicket and planted a vine or shrub or flower about the tent, and called it home.

It was a woman, of course. Man, in his consciousness, never thought of sticking a stem into the earth and nurturing a plant that he might have color and fragrance forever in his presence. Only the woman could have thought of that.

And since the first good day when the woman planted a flower and loved it into blossoming, the home has been a fixity. It has been a center of the affectionate. The building may be destroyed, the individual members of the family may be scattered to the four winds, but the home remains a fixture in the memory—and the blossoms do not fade or wither in the mind.—Columbus Dispatch

A Clever Bird.

People who feed the wild birds in winter find that the birds soon come to know them. A friend of mine used every morning to rap an English walnut on the sill of his open window. A white-breasted nuthatch knew the signal and would fly to his hand and take the nut meat from between his fingers. Sometimes my friend used to hold the nut meat tightly and make the bird work to get it. One morning the nuthatch, hammering at the tightly held morsel, struck the holder's thumb at the base of the nail. The blow hurt, and involuntarily the fingers parted, without any preliminary, the nut-batch hammered at the same place. He knew, and he had learned his lesson in one session too. It is a smart bird that does us well.—Whitthrop Packard in Our Dumb Animals.

All Eskimos have good teeth, but they are subjected to severe usage, being used for chisels, vices and fluting machines. The teeth are employed in drawing bolts, untying knots, holding the mouthpiece of a drill, shaping tool sides and straightening and tanning skins. When they become chipped from hard usage they are leveled off with a file.

CLEAN SCHOOL HOUSES

School Board Should Have Buildings in Readiness for Opening of Schools

Many of our school buildings need not only cleaning, but painting, decorating and repairing in general. The time to begin such work is immediately after the close of school. School boards should not procrastinate. When repairing is left until August, the work may be delayed and the first of September will find repairs unfinished and buildings not in readiness for the opening of school. The movement toward better physical conditions of school surroundings is spreading throughout the state. No better investment can be made than money expended for good school conditions. Every school building should be inspected by school boards and as many improvements as possible made and these should be made without delay. No paint pails, calcimine brushes, cleaning utensils and tools should be in evidence when school opens.

Egg Collector.

Heus used a dark place to lay in, so it is convenient to build a small house for them with a bar or shed. But it is always difficult to get the eggs out of such a trying coop, if it is built economically. To overcome this obstacle a series of chimneys, all leading to the same padded pan, has been arranged.

Each nest is connected to the main shoot and each has a hole in the bottom of it and when an egg is laid it rolls down to the "egg room" of the laying coop. A small door into the "egg room" can be opened and the eggs taken out without trouble. If the chimneys are carefully made there need be no danger of the eggs breaking on the way. - Technical World.

To Grow Head Lettuce.

A successful grower says a liberal quantity of sand in the garden helps greatly with head lettuce. If the soil is clay or silt it is entirely practicable to board in an area of a few square yards and then build a head of sand to mix with the soil in this plot. The same ground may be used year after year for head lettuce. Decayed manure should also be used with freedom on this ground.

Grazing a Tonic For Horses.

Don't confine the work horses in the stable stalls at night. Early in the season provide for a good sized lot into which to turn them after they have eaten their grain and small amount of roughage. There's nothing in the world to equal grazing as a tonic and general conditioner.

BROKE HIS HIP

Vicious Mustang Jumps on and Badly Injures Marion Township Farmer.

Morris Ellis, a young farmer living on the Reuben Pearl farm in Marion township, was the victim of an accident last Saturday that will lay him up for the balance of the summer.

He was drawing stone on a float to which was hitched a team of mustangs. On account of the actions of one of the mustangs he went around in front to take them by the bridle, when one of them reared, striking Ellis with his fore feet, knocking him to the ground and then stepping on him. He was brought to this city and taken to the office of Dr. A. M. Wilkinson, where examination revealed that his leg was broken just below the hip, and he was otherwise badly bruised.

The accident is a serious one to Mr. Ellis, as he had just bought the farm and team and was depending greatly on the summer's work to help him out financially.

JEAN MACDONALD, Canadian, who knows more and does more by way of imitation and impersonation than she has ever been taught—a reader of remarkable versatility and personality.

HORSES AND SWINE.

Shoes should be reset every four or six weeks, according to the condition of the feet.

Don't forget to provide, dry, warm and well ventilated hog houses.

Do not buy a horse that is too light for your work. You will gain nothing by overindulging him. He will soon become unsound and wear out.

Don't feed the brood sow too much corn.

If your horse falls don't shout at him or beat him; help him to get up.

Raise horses for big money, cattle for sure money and hogs for quick money is an old saying and a good one.

Hogs Following Cattle.

The number of hogs to follow a steer will depend on the method of feeding. Some farmers feed the steers more corn than they will eat and run extra hogs, figuring on the hogs getting the waste. While this may be a good policy when corn is cheap, it is doubtful if it should be practiced with high priced grain. It is usually best to figure on about one bushel per steer when steers are fed and two when ear corn is fed. In case the corn is ground or soaked, or silage is used, the number of hogs necessary would be less. The aim should be to run enough hogs to clean up all the waste corn.

Sheep to Test Various Feeds.

Three hundred lambs, averaging fifty-five pounds each and costing $8.50 per 100, or about $1 each, will be used by the animal husbandry department of the Kansas Agricultural college this winter in an attempt to answer these questions:

What is the comparative feeding value of alfalfa and cowpea hay?
What is the difference between corn and kafir for fattening purposes?
How does silage compare with dry feed?
What is the difference in feeding value between ground and whole feed?

Reaching a Conclusion.

"I imagine from your speech that you are a taxidermist."
"What makes you think so?"
"Principally because you tell me I am as wise as an owl and then try to stuff me."—Exchange.

"SILAGE FOR HORSES.

The following summary is presented by the Missouri station in stating in brief form the result of its observations and experiences in feeding silage to horses: Corn silage is now being fed with success by a large number of horsemen and farmers to all classes of horses and mules.

Corn silage should always be fed in combination with other feeds.

Within the limits of its usefulness it is a cheap substitute for hay and adds variety and succulence to the ration.

Silage is not a success except in the hands of a careful feeder with an eye to the thrift of the animal.

Under no circumstances should spoiled silage, either moldy or frozen, be fed to horses or mules.

Temperance

(Conducted by the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union.)

FROM MANY WITNESSES.

In summing up a complete refutation of the statements sent out by the National Wholesale Liquor Dealers association in an article on "Facts About Prohibition in Kansas," Governor Arthur Capper says:

Let us call the witnesses and see what they think of prohibition in Kansas. If anyone should know, they should know, for they live with it and under it:

The governor of Kansas says prohibition is a great success.

Every state official who has spoken out says prohibition succeeds.

More than 700 editors and newspaper men of Kansas in state convention, unanimously endorsed prohibition.

Every political party in Kansas favors the prohibition law.

No minister has ever opened his mouth in favor of return of license; neither has any schoolteacher.

The president of Kansas Retailers says prohibition pays.

The president of the State Bankers' association believes that prohibition is a tremendous asset to Kansas.

One hundred and sixty-six bankers have filed their testimony in favor of the law with the Temperance society of the Methodist Episcopal church, and only six could be found in all the state who doubted the wisdom of this legislation.

The president of the Kansas Medical society believes in prohibition.

The president of the Commercial clubs of Kansas has said that prohibition has added real value to every acre of Kansas land.

The supreme court has testified in the following strong language to the benefits of the prohibition law: "The prohibitory law is well enforced throughout the state. It is as generally well enforced as any other criminal law. The enforcement of the law distinctly promotes social welfare and reduces to a minimum economic waste consequent upon the liquor traffic and allied evils. The saloonkeeper and his comrades have been excluded from effective participation in the politics of the state."

And to completely settle the question for all time the legislature of Kansas, not by a majority, but unanimously passed at its last session a concurrent resolution affirming in no uncertain language its belief in the advantage of prohibition.

FOR WHAT OTHER PURPOSE?

"The moving picture show has become a powerful factor in arousing the prejudice of thoughtless and weak-minded people against the liquor interests, and particularly against the saloon," says the Liberal Advocate, a liquor dealers' organ.

"In virtually every blood and thunder and crime film produced there is sure to be a scene depicting a bunch of lowbrows plotting some villainy from burglary to murder while licking up liberal libations of liquor to give them the proper amount of courage to accomplish their deed."

"Each day thousands of these films are portrayed to millions of men, women and children in every part of the country, and those who know no better, and many who ought to know better, soon become imbued with the belief that liquor is only manufactured and saloons established for the purpose of increasing lawlessness and crime."

PAYS NOTHING BACK.

This from Billy Sunday:

"The saloon comes as near being a rat hole for a wage earner to dump his wages in as anything you can find. The only interest it pays is red eyes and foul breath and the loss of health. You go in with money and you come out with empty pockets. You go in with character and you come out ruined. You go in with a good position and you lose it. You lose your position in the bank, or in the cab of the locomotive. And the saloon pays nothing back but disease and damnation and gives an extra dividend in delirium tremens and a free pass to perdition. And then it will let your wife be buried in the potter's field, and your children go to the asylum, and yet you walk out and say that the saloon is a good institution, when it is the dirtiest thing on earth. It hasn't one leg to stand on and has nothing to commend it to a decent man, not one thing."

Summer Work for Boys Out on the Golf Links

Strict Application to Work Will Be Liberally Rewarded—Outline of Plans for the Season.

In view of several parental inquiries that have reached me regarding the work for boys on the golf course and the caddie proposition in general, I have thought it might be well to reach in this way the parents of boys who are caddies, and of those who might be, setting forth what is offered the boys for this work and what is demanded of them.

I believe it is hardly necessary to dwell here on the advantages that this out-of-door employment has over any indoor work. Let it suffice to say that most of the caddies are school boys, and that a summer of open air existence, filled with such physical exercise and such responsibilities as that of a good caddy, will more than replace the vitality expended in the more or less confining work of the school year just over.

The basis of payment is perhaps already known to most Charlevoix people—30 cents for 9 holes, 50 cents for 18 holes (the full course), and 30 cents an hour for recovering balls played during practice or lessons. The professional caddie, who attends him in all his lessons, earns between $2.50 and $3.00 a day in the busy season. This honor will be passed around among the boys this season, one week at a time. At the close of each week it will be awarded, for the week following, to the most satisfactory caddie of the week just closing.

Furthermore, the members of the Chicago Club offer annually several series of prizes. The first series is for general efficiency and excellence in work and behavior while off duty. These prizes are: Ten dollars, five dollars, three dollars, two dollars and one dollar. In addition to this prizes are given to the winners of the annual caddies' tournament, ten dollars and five dollars respectively, to the winner and runner-up in the first flight, and five dollars and three dollars to the winner and runner-up in the second flight. A sum of money amounting to somewhere between ten and fifteen dollars, is given out each year in recognition of special services of one kind or another, such as for instance, carrying ice each morning from the Chicago Club house to the golf course.

This year a new feature in the line of prizes has been instituted, known as the caddies' savings prizes. At the close of the season the members of the Chicago Club will add ten per cent to all caddies' savings accounts, as shown in pass books from one of the local banks. The pass book in each instance will be inspected and the amount deposited compared with the total amount earned by the depositor during the season.

There is at present some talk of instituting a caddies' field day, to be held annually at the close of each season, with a one dollar prize for the winner and a fifty cent prize for second place in each event. Along with this probability, is that of the installment of an extensive gymnasium apparatus in the caddie yard. These additions may not be realized this season, but they are under consideration.

doubtedly on the way if the boys show proper appreciation in the form of care of property and conscientious service. But probably the most attractive inducement (for the boys, at least), is the annual caddies' excursion, held toward the middle of August each year. Last year the boys spent the day at Cross Village, chartering the Beaver for the trip. The place of this year's outing has not yet been decided.

The expense of the excursion, between eighty and a hundred dollars, is entirely covered by subscriptions from the players. As a day's outing the excursion cannot be excelled. Ask anyone who went last year.

In return for the "good things" that have been enumerated, there are of course certain requirements. First of all, earnestness. This includes the three good qualities of a caddie, application, obedience and honesty. Every boy is expected to apply himself to his work; to be a help to his player and not a drawback. He is expected to do as he is told by those in charge, and to act promptly and willingly. I believe there are enough boys in and around Charlevoix who "mean business," so that those who "lie down on the job," do not have to be enrolled. Piffing, either from the players or from other caddies, will be to be countenanced.

In the large new shelter that the club has just erected for the caddies, there are eighty wall compartments for diners, coats, etc. The shelter is a beautiful building matching the Field House in style and color, is electric lighted and contains running water, a wash basin and toilet. The running water, by the way, is from the city pipes, and not from Pine Lake, as has been foolishly claimed at times in the past.

Of course the larger and older a boy the better caddie he may make. He does not always do so, however. Any twelve or thirteen year old boy of normal size should be strong enough for the work. Every possible measure will be taken to see that no boy's strength is overtaxed, and that no injustice is done in any case. Under the present system of numbers and rotation, each boy has an equal chance to work, if he is on the job. Punctuality and steadiness will mean at least a dollar a day for a boy during approximately two months of the season.

I believe there are many boys in Charlevoix who need what this summer's work has to offer them, and whom the work certainly needs. I hope this article will get to those boys and that it will convince their parents, where convincing is necessary, that the boys will do well to put in this season at the links. A column will be maintained in the Courier that will keep the people at large in touch with the work and success of the boys and the players generally.

Caddie Master.

Economy Hints

A penny saved is a penny earned.—Benjamin Franklin.

NEW celery has a perfect forest of leaves of in good condition. The entire cost of these leaves from field to kitchen is something as they occupy at least half of the space of the whole bunch sometimes. Must they inevitably go into the waste can? No, it is wholly unnecessary. Every fall cut away to cooked to the real enhancement of the menu on which it appears.

Celery is lower in price now and better in some respects than at any other season of the year, but except for the hearts the most of it is better cooked than raw, although poorly cooked celery is a dreary dish. We may dry some of the leaves for future use, although this is less done than formerly because this relish is in season practically all the year around now.

In a tough stew the cooked celery tastes—consisting of the leaves and the small stalk above the joint, which is rarely or never eaten raw, is about the most savory thing in the whole dish. For greens we can use white and green leaves alike, picking them over as we pick over any greens, and removing carefully those which are tough or rusty and also the rusty stalks. Any very green and heavily ribbed outer stalks may be peeled just as rhubarb is peeled, then cut up in small pieces and cooked with the greens. The inside is white and pulpy. More than half of what is most generally thrown away as refuse can be put to very good use. The leaves from ten good stalks of celery will furnish greens for three or four people or a salad for that number.

Celery Greens.—Do not remove the leaves from the stalk unless the latter is rusty or large. After picking over wash very thoroughly in several waters, then drop into boiling water and blanch for five minutes. Drain, put back in kettle, cover with boiling water, slightly salted, and cook until tender, or about half an hour, not allowing the water to boil violently but to just boil. Serve just as you would other greens. Fresh butter and then a little lemon juice or vinegar may be added.

A little of these greens, buttered and seasoned with a few drops of vinegar, was taken to some one who had never heard of using celery tops in this way, because very few people probably have ever tried cooking them, and she at first seemed quite perplexed as she tasted, thinking them like asparagus, and they are mild enough to suggest that.

Cooked Celery Top Salad.—When the leaves are cooked, drain and add a little butter while they are hot, then serve cold with only a few drops of vinegar, or do not add the butter and serve with a French dressing. A guest who happened in while these were being manipulated in various ways said very positively that she had eaten far worse salads.

USE BICARBONATE OF SODA.

How to Destroy the Offensive Onion Odor.

What is the secret of destroying the "onion breath"? Not all the spices of Araby can do it, but there is a simple deodorant that has its place on every cupboard shelf which will do the trick. Bend low and lend an ear—plain bicarbonate of soda, saleratus or baking soda—take your choice of a name, the effect is the same.

Trickle with a solution made by its solution one to one and a half teaspoonfuls of the soda in a quart of water and gargle and gargle out gargle, they will forth to your dinner with a clear conscience and a sweet, clean breath.

The virtues of bicarbonate of soda as a deodorant are known and appreciated by very few, most of them nurses and physicians. What woman will not be glad to learn, for instance, that it is a perfect neutralizer of perspiration odors? There are many expensive powders put up for this purpose and some of them are effective, but plain sodium bicarbonate at 2 cents a whole lot is quite as good as the best of them. It may be rubbed on the cheeks or through the armbands of a white shirt waist and be relied upon to neutralize any odor. The armpits may also be treated with a solution of it before dressing.

It was "metaphor." "How is that? It always comes at first cost in arguments with his wife."

"He states his case first and then walks off!"—Pittsburgh Ledger.

Superiority. "She's a very superior person." "Don't see it in what way?" "She plays cards for her gowns than any other women in the club."—Detroit Free Press.

THEATRICAL

Vein of Pathos.

There is a slight touch of pathos in "The Time, The Place and The Girl," which serves to bring into even more prominent relief the comedy element and the musical numbers. The show will be here Monday, July 12, as the opening bill of the big Boyle-Woolfolk-LaSalle Musical Comedy combination at the Charlevoix Theatre.

Great Dancing Team.

Trathern & Garbelle are commonly regarded as with the possible exception of Mr. and Mrs. Vernon Castle, the foremost of American society dancers. They will be here as an added feature with the Big Boyle-Woolfolk-LaSalle Musical Comedy combination which inaugurates a three day stay at the Charlevoix Theatre on Monday, July 12.

ANNUAL SCHOOL MEETING MONDAY

Two Officers To Be Elected For Term Of Three Years.

R. W. Kane and Frank Glassford Retiring Members—Good Attendance Desired.

On Monday evening, July 12, will occur the annual school meeting of District No. 1, which comprises the whole of Charlevoix and a small amount of outside territory. The annual meeting will occur at the high school building, and the election of officers will take place at the same time.

One of the features of the meeting will be the reading of the Board of Education's reports, covering school affairs, for the past year, and the passing of the annual school budget. This represents the amount to be raised by taxation in the district for school expenses for the coming year. The Board will make up the budget and recommend it to the meeting.

Two members of the school board will be elected on July 12. The terms of R. W. Kane and Frank M. Glassford expire and their successors will be chosen at this meeting.

Charlevoix's annual school meetings have been well attended in recent years. This year it is the desire of the members of the board to have a much larger attendance. An important resolution will be presented to introduce a new line of training in the schools, and at a recent meeting of the board a resolution was passed to notify the citizens of what is to take place, thus making a special effort to fill the schoolroom with those who should be vitally interested in the welfare of the school. Below is printed the notice sent out by the board:

"The Annual School meeting will be held in the high school room on Monday evening, July 12, and will be called to order at 7:30 o'clock. It is the earnest desire of the Board of Education that you be present and take part in the deliberations, hear the reports and help to instruct those whom you elect to office. The school tax is the heaviest burden the tax payers have to bear. We spend more money, each year for the support of the schools, than we do for the conducting of city affairs. Too little interest has been manifested by the patrons of the schools in the annual meetings. By resolution, this year this personal notification is given you, that you may not have the excuse of ignorance of the date. An important resolution will be presented, to introduce a new line of training in the schools. We want your vote on this proposition. Please be present if possible. Women who pay taxes are voters and will be welcomed at this meeting."

Navel Ill of Colts and Calves Increasing

Many Are Dying in County on Account of Lack of Proper Attention—What to Do.

In my practice within the last few weeks I have been called upon to treat a large number of colts and calves suffering from Pyo-Septicemia or Navel Ill. This is an acute, contagious, infectious disease of the newborn animals, occurring in the first days of life and not later than four weeks old. The percentage of mortality in this disease is indeed very high, and I think it my duty as a veterinarian and lover of animals to say a few words to the farmer and stockman.

This disease appears more frequently in colts and calves. The best opportunity for the spreading of this disease is in studs and dairies, where the new born may become infected.

The disease gains entrance as a result of infection through the umbilicus. The stump of the navel cord is loose and juicy. It is no longer nourished, and the blood present on the torn end of the cord presents a suitable place for the germ to develop, until the drying of the cord takes place. The germ then enters the system through this way. The stump of the cord becomes infected through coming into contact with the straw immediately after birth as well as by coming in contact with the stable floor, or by the hands of the attendant, which may be infected.

Symptoms—The symptoms usually appear from 24 to 48 hours after birth, exceptionally later. In some cases the animals are born affected with it. In

KEEP TO THE RIGHT

City Officials Place Little Red Police on all Street Intersections.

The first real effort on the part of the city officials to regulate traffic in the congested parts of the city was taken last Friday morning. Little red policemen—made of wood, of course—have been placed in the center of all street intersections on Bridge street, Michigan avenue, and Belvedere avenue. The signs are painted red, and lettered upon them in white are the words: "Keep to the Right—Safety First."

It is the intention of the police department to make all automobiles and vehicles observe the road rule of turning to the right, also keeping to the right of the street at all times. Drivers must also turn "square corners," not shoot across at any place.

For a while that may be confusing, but in a short time it will become a habit. It means safety, not only for the drivers themselves, but the public at large. Keep it in mind—turn to the right.

GRANGERS HAVE FINE MEETING

Over a Hundred Members Present at Pomona Last Week.

Next Meeting to be Held at Ironton. Date to be Announced Later.

Pomona Grange met with Rock Elm Grange June 27th, and called to order at 11:30 a.m., the worthy master presiding and over 100 members present. The following committees were appointed: Good of the Order—Messdames Ruhlberg, Murphy and Hutson.

Grange Membership—Miss Clara Nowland, Ed. Metz and Miss May Stewart. Grange Headquarters at Fair Ground—H. L. Olney, M. Ruhlberg, Wm. Mears and E. H. Clark.

Grange adjourned to 1:30 p. m. for dinner hour. After dinner the meeting was called to order by the Master and turned over to Worthy Lecturer Clark. Bros. Clark and Metz gave a violin and cornet piece and the Grange a song, "Triumph of Toil," followed by an address by R. O. Bisbee, of East Jordan, on "Business and Farmer." Co-operation is his solution for the farmer.

The class from Walker school treated the Grange to a song, "Prohibition Coming," sung to tune of "Tipperary."

Miss May Stewart gave an address—"The School and Patrons," and gave some very instructive arguments along educational lines; Bro. Joe Clark gave a reading from one of Hon. A. C. Cartor's speeches entitled "Michigan," given in Chicago recently. This concluded the lecture hour for the afternoon.

The Grange had a short business session; voted $40 to apply on the Hall debt and on motion authorized master and secretary to give Bro. Wm. Mears credentials giving authority to solicit for the new Grange Year Book.

Ironton was chosen for the place of August meeting, the date to be left to Lecturer Clark to announce in time to get advertised and in the meantime try to arrange for a state speaker. The meeting then adjourned for supper until 8:00 p. m.

After supper Grange opened with full house. Song by the Grange. Discussion of "Merits of the Dairy Cow" was led by Bro. J. E. Secord, showing he knew the business, and was taken up by others including E. E. Beals, of Antrim County. "Merits of the Dual Purpose Cow," in the absence of Bro. Stevenson, the discussion was led by Emil Nassen, and he handled the subject in fine shape though only an 18-year old boy, and demonstrated that the M. A. C. does for boys who attend. Mrs. J. S. Secord sang a solo. Rev. T. Porter Bennett's address on the "Co-operation of Church and Rural Communities" was fine.

Three candidates were obligated in the 5th degree by the Overseer, in the absence of the Master, this concluding the session. Everyone voted they had a good time and that Rock Elm Grange is a good place to meet.

NOT APPRECIATED

Sheehan Opera Company Deserved a Much Larger House Than Was Present.

The size of the audience that greeted the Sheehan Opera Company at the Charlevoix Theatre last Wednesday evening, was a plain indication that Charlevoix theatre goes do not appreciate grand opera. It might be well also to add that it was a great discouragement to Manager Bridge, who was instrumental in getting the company to make this city.

The company gave a delightful and classical entertainment. Cleopatra and the pretty musical drama Cavalleria Rusticana were the evening's offering, and should have been heard and witnessed by a packed house.

Joseph Sheehan can be called one of the foremost American tenors. He has a voice of great range and pleasing quality.

Miss Mirth Carman in her impersonation of Santuzza, well showed the loveliness and flexibility of her voice. Her delivery was exceedingly artistic throughout. Mercedes Delmada as Cleopatra, Queen of Egypt, was enthusiastically received.

The entertainment was by far the best ever seen on the stage in Charlevoix, and it was a shame that such a deserving attraction could not have been better patronized.

From fifteen to twenty five special song numbers will be heard in each of the bills to be offered here by The Big Boy Wolfolk LaSalle Musical Comedy combination. The vocal department of the attraction is especially worthy of praise. Charlevoix Theatre, July 12, 13 and 14.

SATURDAY SET FOR TAG DAY

Michigan Children's Home Society Carry On Great Work

Local Committee to Have Work in Charge and Will Solicit Funds

Saturday, July 10, will be Tag Day in Charlevoix. The work of soliciting funds for the care of homeless children will be in charge of a committee consisting of Messdames O. E. Wilbur, Harry Nicholls, A. F. Bridge, John Burns, Frank Harris, Jennie Alexo, Richard Lewis, P. D. Campbell and A. L. Coulter, secretary and treasurer. The committee expect to put up a strenuous campaign for funds and endeavor to have Charlevoix donate her proportionate share in taking care of the state's homeless.

"Desertus," the homeless child of Michigan, is represented in the emblem of the Michigan Children's Home Society, as the Child with Outstretched Arms. This was adopted several years ago by the National Children's Home Society, as the official emblem of that organization. This is a federation of some thirty state societies associated for the better carrying on of this great work of finding good Christian homes for homeless and dependent children.

For nearly a quarter of a century this society has been working in Michigan, and every year its usefulness and efficiency is increasing. Last year the total of 249 were under the legal control of the organization, and 203 were placed in foster homes on trial for adoption. 420 wards of the society were visited in supervision by representatives of the society, 348 homes were investigated as applicants for foster children, and 349 other children, not received as legal wards, were temporarily cared for looking to their restoration to their natural parents.

The M. C. H. S. stands ready to investigate and help, if worthy, any case of homeless or neglected childhood in any county in Michigan. Persons knowing of such children, or acquainted with childless homes where a boy or girl is wanted, should notify one of the representatives when in town, or write the main office at St. Joseph.

The business administration of this important state-wide charity is worthy of the confidence of those who wish to invest in such an enterprise. The board of trustees keep close supervision of all receipts and disbursements. All contributions are carefully acknowledged and recorded. All bills are audited by a special committee of the board before being paid, and all checks are signed by the Secretary and countersigned by a member of the auditing committee. Monthly reports are made of all children's and all financial matters, and the most careful investigation of methods and results of the work is sincerely invited.

This society receives no state appropriation, though it is licensed by the state and approved by the State Board of Charities and Corrections. All support comes from voluntary gifts, and especially in this year of many homeless children as well as financial depression, the hearty support of the public is earnestly invited.

Look for the emblem, "The Child With The Outstretched Arms."

Series of Nine Sermons.

Next Sunday morning at the Baptist church the pastor will deliver the first of a series of nine sermons, which cover the whole plan of salvation. Sunday morning subject "From Nature to Grace." M. E. Gray and Wife of Toronto, Entertained at Stevenson Home.

A very pleasant surprise party was given at the home of Mr. and Mrs. W. J. Stevenson, last Wednesday evening, in honor of their cousins, U. E. Gray and wife of Toronto, Ont., who have been visiting there.

Those present were Rev. C. E. Taggart, Mrs. Taggart and Miss Taggart, Mr. and Mrs. John Burns, Mr. and Mrs. F. M. Harris, Judge Correll and Mrs. Correll, Mr. and Mrs. and Mrs. Geo. Anderson, Mrs. M. A. Stewart and E. A. Stewart, Mr. and Mrs. H. W. Widdifield, Miss Clark, and Mrs. H. P. Parmelee.

A fine picnic supper was served, and the evening most enjoyably spent with music and social intercourse.

After a few well chosen remarks by Rev. Taggart, the party dispersed, leaving a very happy impression with Mr. and Mrs. Gray of their visit in Charlevoix.

TOOK HIS OWN LIFE

Body of William Bartley at East Jordan Found Hanging to a Tree.

Wm. Bartley, a farmer living southwest of the city, committed suicide last Wednesday by hanging himself to a tree about thirty rods from his residence. Deceased had been in poor health for some time and had been worrying over the outlook for the season. Several days ago he went to Petoskey to consult Dr. Reycraft, who told him his trouble was nervousness and that he must be careful or it would develop into something worse. From a remark he made Tuesday in the city it is thought that he was then fearful of approaching insanity.

In the morning he went to a neighbor's and started home about ten o'clock saying he had to fix a fence. That was the last seen of him alive. Not coming to dinner at noon, the family, consisting of a wife and four daughters, became alarmed, especially when visiting the barn they found a rope from which a piece had been freshly cut. About 1:00 o'clock the body was found hanging to a tree.

Sheriff Cook was notified and he sent for Coroner Wilkinson and together they went to the place, where the surrounding left no doubt of suicide, and the coroner decided no inquest was necessary.

Deceased was 48 years of age and was one of the earlier residents of this region.—East Jordan Enterprise.

Cold Weather Has Killed Little Pests

Some Give This as Reason There Are So Few Flies—Others "Swat Em" Campaign

"It's the weather. They're all dead."

"No, it isn't. It's the campaign. Sure, they're all dead."

Well, which is it?

Anyway, both sides agree that they're all dead, but the reason, it is plain to see, cannot be agreed upon. Anyway, there is a marked shortage of flies this year. For some one or several reasons these little pests seem to have wandered away and just died or, else they have gone away on a vacation.

Some have suggested that flies like trouble, carnage and war and, therefore, have gone across the ocean to the scene of the great struggle. Anyway, they're gone, so let's keep 'em gone. How? Well, just read on.

A safe and effective weapon against the typhoid or house fly has been found in powdered hellebore by scientists of the department of agriculture. Flies lay their eggs chiefly in stable manure. Powdered hellebore mixed with water and sprinkled over the manure, will destroy the larvae which are hatched from the eggs.

Since powdered hellebore is readily obtainable, this puts in the hands of everyone a remedy for one of the pests that has been found dangerous as well as troublesome. Powdered hellebore, however, will not kill adult flies which must be swatted or trapped.

It has long been known that flies breed in manure, but previous methods of destroying the larvae there by the use of strong chemicals have been open to the objection that the treatment under some conditions lessened the fertilizing value of the manure or actually injured vegetation.

This is not true of powdered hellebore. Government experiments have

The picnic planned for Saturday by a few of the young people was not spoiled by the weather. Since the rain prohibited them from going to Harwood Lake as they had planned, the lunches were carried to the Cliff Farm.

The old picnic ground was a scene of great activity on Saturday. For the first time in several years Norwood celebrated the Fourth at home. A pot luck luncheon was served under the cedars and was followed by games for the children. At 3.30 there was a base ball game between the Barnard and Norwood boys in which Norwood was badly defeated.

LOADING A SOLDIER.

Weights the Privates in European Armies Have to Carry.

The weight a soldier in active service has to carry often becomes a burden, and frequently in a retreat or a flight much of it is thrown away.

Nearly all the soldiers belonging to European armies have to carry about with them in the field a kit which ranges in weight from thirty-eight to sixty-one pounds.

The equipment that the different soldiers carry about with them is very similar. It generally comprises a rifle and bayonet, with rags and so on for keeping them clean; an intricate bugle and, of course, a number of rounds of ammunition. Then there are the various articles of clothing, with changes, and a first aid outfit.

All the soldiers with one exception carry a knife, fork and spoon, water bottle and mess tin. The Russians, who are the exception, carry a wooden spoon only, which they keep in their boots. There is also a supply of food carried and generally one or two reserve or emergency rations. Together with an overcoat and the knapsack and similar appointments, the load to be carried is a considerable one.

The Russian carry most, the weight working out at sixty-one pounds, while the British, French and Germans come next in order, carrying weights of forty-seven, forty-four and thirty-eight pounds respectively. Pearson's Weekly.

A Freak of the Sea.

Like the ribs of a long dead giant so stand the rusty ribs of the U. S. S. Wateree, two miles inland, at the foot of the Anles, where the ship was deposited in 1898 by a monster tidal wave. There is more Catarrh in this section of the country than in all other diseases put together, and until the last few years was supposed to be incurable. For a great many years doctors pronounced it a local disease and prescribed local remedies, and by constantly failing to cure with local treatment, pronounced it incurable. Science has proven Catarrh to be a constitutional disease, and therefore requires constitutional treatment. Hall's Catarrh Cure, manufactured by E. J. Cheney & Co., Toledo, Ohio, is the only Constitutional cure on the market. It is taken internally in doses from 10 drops to a teaspoonful. It acts directly on the blood and mucous surfaces of the system. They offer one hundred dollars, for any case it fails to cure. Send for circulars and testimonials. Address: E. J. THE LADY AND THE COBRA.

With a Violin Recital the Effects of Which Were Magical.

An Englishwoman residing in India one evening found to her horror that a huge cobra had coiled itself about her veranda rails, near which she sat playing the violin. She was too near the snake to run with safety, so she continued playing while she gradually edged away. At first her only idea was to keep the creature thus engaged while she escaped, but when she had gained a safer distance and perhaps fascinated by the unwonted sight a strange inspiration seized her. She played all after air of different character.

The effect was magical. That snake behaved like an ardent, hot blooded disciple of Paganini. Every variation in the music, whether of volume or of tone, produced instantly a corresponding change in the attitude of the cobra. If she played a lively dance it swayed its body sideways in quick time and yet in graceful curves. Once she struck a number of false notes in rapid succession on purpose. The cobra winced and writhed in pain, as if suddenly struck with a whip.

This creature behaved like a mad musician till the lady, getting tired of the sport, gradually moved herself farther and farther and then made a sudden bolt into her room and banged the door, leaving the cobra to wander disconsolate to its lair in the fields.—London Chronicle.

The Social Code.

Men are kept orderly, clean and decent through the strength of an unconsciousness to social opinion which the prophets of individualism are in such haste to deplore. The social code, no doubt, always involves much innate quavery, much stupidity, some hypocrisy and some wickedness; but, taken by and large, the average of its prescriptions has probably been higher in every age than the average of undirected and unfettered individual impulse. Many of the things embodied in that wide ranging, multifarious thralldom called the sense of the community are undoubtedly right, since they were once the distinctions of heroic individuals or the discoveries of fearless individuals.—O. W. Pickens in Atlantic Monthly.

"A Poor Poet."

One afternoon Browning went to call on Lady Kimbly and missed his way. A lady was standing on her doorstep and he asked her to direct him to the house. She could not tell him, but offered to look it up for him in the directory and took him into the house, produced a directory, and together they found out what he wanted to know, and then she came out to the doorstep again so that she could point out to him the direction he had to take. He thanked her, went down the steps hesitated and then turned and came back to her, saying: "Perhaps you may like to know, to whom you have been so kind. I am a poor poet, and my name is Robert Browning."—Westminster Gazette.

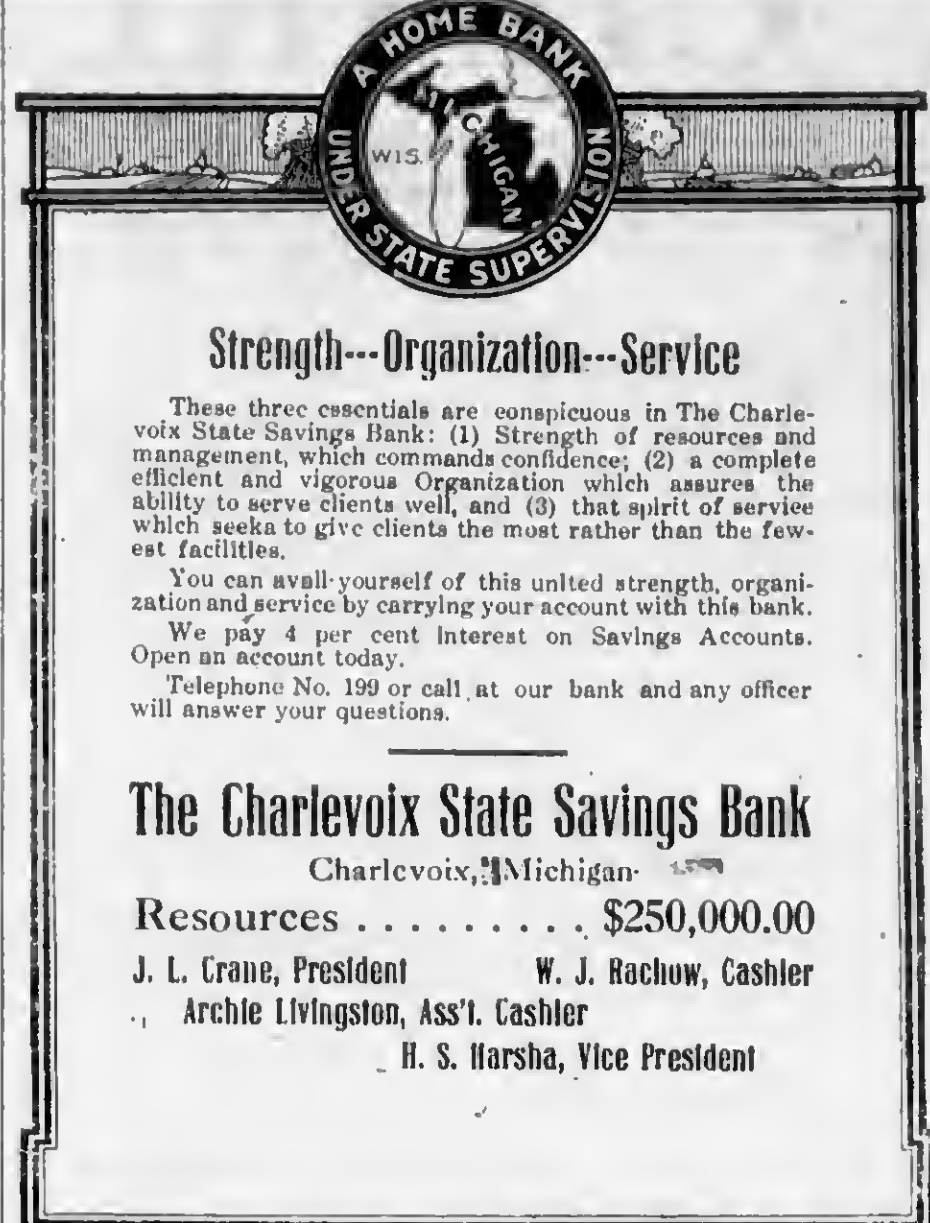

A Bright Scholar.

One of the earliest French princes being too indolent or too simple to acquire his subjects by the ordinary processes, a squad of servants were armed in attendance upon him, each with a huge letter pinned upon his breast. As he knew not their names he was obliged to call them by their letter when he wanted their services, which in due time gave him the requisite degree of literature for the exercise of the royal functions.

READ "PEG O' MY HEART"

PEG AND MICHAEL

It will appear serially in this paper.

The play ran 604 consecutive nights, or about two years, at a New York theater, scoring one of the greatest hits of the past decade.

The story, like the play, was written by J. Hartley Manners. It is full of heart interest. It is witty and clever. Every line of it will entertain you.

A romping, madcap, bewitching Irish girl is turned over to the care of aristocratic English relatives.

They dislike her, but Peg holds her own with jaunty pride, and in the end, by her generosity and big heartedness, wins them over, and, what is more, wins her fortune, and, what is still more, wins a very gallant lover.

EARTH ROADS.

The earth roads are important channels for the commerce of the country, are large factors in the social and church life of rural communities and are of vital importance to the present rural educational interests and the future industrial developments of agriculture. The very life, credit and prosperity of our country require that the rural community shall have the highest possible development, and the quality of the road from the farm to the village and the town may aid or retard this development. On one hand, the earth roads should not be improved at such expense that the cost will be a real burden upon the community, and, on the other hand, the roads must not be so poor as to be a bar to the highest reasonable development of the community. In nearly every case the earth roads can be greatly improved without appreciable expense and with much advantage to the local community and to the entire country.—Ira O. Baker.

BOND BUILT ROADS.

Financing Maintenance of Highways as Important as Financing Construction. We learned long ago about the benefits of good roads to trading communities. The states and the federal office of public roads have also taught us to discriminate between clay roads, gravel roads, rock roads, and all the other kinds of roads, and the federal office has made a thorough study of the problems of road finance. A typical instance of mismanagement that was brought to the attention of the office occurred in a southern state.

CHICHESTER'S PILLS

where $40,000 was recently distributed equally over nearly ninety miles of highway. After deducting necessary overhead expenses this sum was equivalent to about $400 a mile.

Obviously no permanent results could be obtained from such a distribution. In another county, where heavy rains and severe winters could not fail to make the roads nearly impassable with the superficial construction adopted, bonds were issued to the amount of $300,000. The money was devoted to light grading on an excessive mileage, without any attempt at surfacing.

The use of public credit to develop public wealth is the first argument for highway bonds. A mile of road sustaining 3,000 tons of travel a year would pay interest and retirement on $1,000 in 4 per cent bonds if the cost of hauling were reduced about 2.4 cents a ton mile.

Financing the maintenance of a road is just as important as financing its construction. Failures of good roads movements are often the direct results of failures properly to provide for systematic maintenance. It is undoubtedly necessary in general to establish direct tax for annual repair and maintenance of bond built highways. When highway bonds are issued it should be understood that within a few years there will be, besides the tax for interest and retirement, an additional tax for repairs and maintenance if the regular road tax within the county is not already sufficient. The experts point out that this repair and maintenance charge is inevitable, and it is equally unwise to free the repair and maintenance charges in the beginning.—Country Gentleman.

ROAD BUILDING IN SCHOOLS.

Plan to Interest Oklahoma Boys in Good Roads Movement.

The good road educational movement is to reach the country boy in Oklahoma through the rural schools, as the result of advocacy of such a plan by Colonel Sidney Rogers of Ardmore, state highway commissioner, who has secured the endorsement and co-operation of other prominent state officials.

The plan as outlined by Colonel Rogers is to organize a good roads and tree planting club in every rural school in the state, have the county or state highway engineer visit the schools, following the organization of the clubs, and proceed to lay out one-fourth or one-half mile of road leading from the schoolhouse. In every instance the school club shall assist in the survey, the laying out of the road, in securing the easements from the abutting property owners. The club boys shall carry the clubs, set the grade stakes, learn just how plans and profits are made and be taught that this piece of good read will be used for generations to come.

Only the building of a common dirt road will be undertaken at the start by the boys. They will be taught that if they desire in the future to put gravel or macadam on the road that they have in the well built dirt road a foundation already prepared for such an improvement. In this manner, too, they may be taught to use such materials as are most suitable and convenient at the time and the nearest at hand.

Road Construction in New Mexico.

A total of $525,000 was expended for road construction in New Mexico during 1914, according to a report from the office of State Engineer James A. French. It is also reported that during 1915 $520,000 will be expended exclusive of an issue of $500,000 of state bonds which have not yet been sold. Among the improvement projects which will be taken up during 1915 are the Santa Fe-Taos road, the Los Lunas-Gallup road, the Ocean to Ocean highway from Socorro to the Arizona line, the All Southern route and a portion of the Borderland route.

Has Used a Majestic Range For Over Twelve Years

It hardly seems possible that any Range could be used this length of time, but the following sworn affidavit of R. T. Mears states that he has used a Majestic Range in his home for this length of time, and that today, as far as he can see, the range is good for many years more of service. Read what he says about the Majestic:

State of Michigan,
County of Charlevoix, ss.

R. T. Mears, being duly sworn, deposes and says that he has used a Majestic Range in his home for the past twelve years. Deponent further swears that during this time he has spent but 75c for repairs on said Majestic Range, and that today the range is in splendid condition and shows but little evidence of its long usage. Deponent further says that during a greater portion of this time he has burned coal in the above mentioned range, and that he has never had to replace any of the parts of the fire box, and that the fire back is, from all that he can see, as good as ever.

R. T. MEARS.

Subscribed to before me this 18th day of May, A. D., 1915.

My commission expires July 13, 1915.

What better recommendation can a Range be given than that above by Mr. Mears for the Majestic.

Users of the Majestic from all parts of the country give testimony of the same nature. If you want a range that is a fuel saver, easy to operate, one that will LAST, the Majestic is the one to buy.

The Earliest Artillery.

We think the earliest form of artillery as distinctly modern. Yet the first cannon ever taken into the field were of that caliber. A crude mortar was fired at the battle of Crecy, fought in 1346. The early cannon balls were chiseled from stone, and the projectile, which fits the ancient mortar, is made of solid granite. Two powerful men could scarcely lift it. These ancient projectiles remained in use for a surprisingly long time, for it is recorded that in 1807 a British man of war engaged against the Turks had her mainmast severed by a 700 pound stone shot from a Turkish battery.—American Boy.

One Thing He Couldn't Do.

Milking a cow is not an easy task for an unpracticed hand. Leslie Stephen, the famous English literary light, was once on a long tramp in Switzerland, accompanied by his friend, Dr. Morgan. They missed their way and found themselves, parched and hungry, far from any dwelling place. At length they came across a cow, from whom they determined to extract some nourishment, but after trying their best for an hour, each holding on to her horns in turn, they had to abandon all hopes of milk. This, remarks Dr. Morgan, is "one of the very few occasions on which I ever saw Stephen fairly thwarted."—London Spectator.

Entered at Charlevoix Postoffice as second class matter.

Among the numerous achievements to which the Republican party can justly point with pride is the enactment of the reclamation law, passed in 1902 by a Republican president. Under the provisions of that law reclamation projects have been constructed affording water supply sufficient for 1,300,000 acres of land. During 1913, the crop production on land already supplied with water exceeded in value $15,700,000.

This production was from an area of only 700,000 acres then under cultivation. The last annual report of the Reclamation Service shows that with relatively small additional expense, the total acreage supplied with water can be increased to 3,000,000 acres.

Considering the immense amount of work to be done in the construction of reclamation projects on a plan designed to be permanent, it is remarkable what rapid progress has been made. The first considerable amount of irrigation on government projects was reached in 1906, when 22,000 acres of arid land was supplied with water. In 1913, which is the latest date for which statistics are available, the total of 700,000 acres was reached.

The reclamation of arid land under government projects is still in its infancy, and has necessarily been slow because both the government officials and the farmers have been compelled to learn by experience what methods are most successful and satisfactory. Development will be far more rapid in future. Vast acres of land that was previously abandoned to sage brush, jack rabbits, and coyotes, will, for all time to come, make pleasant homes for thrifty American farmers, produce food for residents of American cities and add enormously to the total wealth of the nation.

These irrigation farmers are raising alfalfa, fruit, grain, vegetables, practically every farm product that can be grown anywhere. The alfalfa supplies feed for live stock. The live stock furnishes raw material for the packing houses. The laborers in the packing houses are buyers of all kinds of food and clothing, and other necessities of life. The $15,000,000 of products on irrigated land in 1913, was but the beginning of a chain of business that furnished profitable employment for thousands of men and women.

The framers of the reclamation act anticipated that development must be slow, and, therefore, they provided for settlement by homeseekers under a plan of payment by installments covering a ten year period, which period congress has since extended to 20 years. The purpose of the act was to provide more farm homes and extend the area of productive lands. While the act was a departure from accepted ideas as to the proper scope of government, experience has proven the wisdom of government initiative in an undertaking so large that private enterprise could not be expected to invest unless given concessions that might ultimately be found against the interests of homeseekers.

Although President Wilson has declared that the Republican party has not had a new idea in thirty years, the Reclamation act stands upon the statute books alongside the pure food law, the postal savings bank law and the parcel post as a mute but permanent evidence of the constructive policies of that party.

THEATRICAL

The final week of the LaSalle stock company at the Empress is one of its best. "Lovers and Lunatics" is different from any of the preceding offerings and is farce with music, but as it depends upon action rather than music it goes with snap and zest.

The piece which is by Mark Swan and Boyle Woolfolk is a musical version of "A Runaway Match" and there is enough action created by the mother and daughter who are in love with a son and father, to keep the complications in a whirl and it is not until the last act that the two young people and the two older ones are paired off.

Vogelsly, Olive Vall is sadly missed from the cast. Her successor, Loraine Bernard, who appears as Mrs. Eleanor March, the dashing widow, is a clever actress whose attractive personality helps to atone for her lack of voice.

Guy Voyer puts a lot of "go" in the piece by his spirited acting and he adapts himself well to the farcical spirit. Joe Wood does good work as Cuthbert Claxton, father of the young man, who is in love with Mrs. March's seventeen-year-old daughter, Millie March, a part which is charmingly played by Harriet Lee. Steve Gillis gets a lot of good comedy out of the role of the "loney" servant, Steven Short. Minnie Pillard has the comedy role of Mary Jane Pennywise, hostess of Towseley Inn.

There are several good musical numbers, among them "On the Road to Jerico," which goes particularly well.

The last act has a very effective setting and gives opportunity for some attractive specialties. Dolly Thathern has a pretty staged song, the LaSalle quartet was recalled four times and the dance by Miss Thathern and Mr. Gillis was another pretty feature.—Grand Rapids Press, June 29, 1915.

The La Salle Stock Co. will appear in Lovers and Lunatics and other Musical Comedies at the Charlevoix Theatre, July 12, 13 and 14.

A seedily looking poet said to a New York publisher, "I want you to publish these poems in book form." "Well, I'll look them over, but I cannot promise to bring them out unless you have a well known name." "Oh, that's all right. My name is known wherever the English language is spoken." "Ah, indeed. What is your name?" John Smith.

Two Irishmen were crossing the ocean on the way to America. On the voyage 'Pat died. Preparations were made for the burial at sea but the lead weights customarily used in such cases were lost, and chunks of coal were substituted. Everything was finally ready for the last rites, and long and earnestly did Michael look at his friend. Finally he blurted out, sorrowfully, "Well, Pat, I always knew ye were going there, but I'm hanged if I thought they'd make ye carry yer own coal."

A little girl was sent by her mother to the grocery store with a jug for a quart of vinegar. "But, mamma," said the little one, "I can't say that word." "But you must try," said the mother, "for I must have the vinegar and there's no one else to send." So the little girl went with the jug, and as she reached the counter of the store she pulled the cork out of the jug with a pop, swung the jug on the counter with a thud, and said to the astonished clerk: "There, smell of that and give me a quart."

An eight-year-old boy went to a church picnic, and, being a favorite with the ladies, was liberally supplied with good things to eat. Later in the day one of the ladies noticed the boy sitting near a stream with a woe-begone expression on his face and his hands clasped on his stomach. "Why what's the matter, Billie?" she kindly asked. "Haven't you had enough to eat?" "Oh, yes'm," said the boy, "I've had enough. I feel as tho I don't want all I've got."

AMONG THE PLAYERS

And Caddies

The professional caddie for the week of June 28-July 3, was Clyde Chase. His earnings during the week amounted to $13.37, and the season isn't more than started, either. The position has been awarded to Tom Howard for the current week.

Saturday, July 3, was the busiest day of the season so far, with 115 starters, and the caddies were $57.50 richer at evening than they were in the morning. Wind, rain and cold was all that kept Monday, July 5, from being busier.

Preliminary measures have been taken in the matter of the Outdoor Gymnasium apparatus for the caddie yard at the links. It is expected to have this installed for use next spring at the latest.

It is hoped that the caddies will begin immediately to take advantage of the Caddies Savings offer as made by the Chicago Club. Remember, lads, 10 per cent. added to all caddies' accounts as shown on pass books of the local banks. Deposits must be made regularly during the season. Save a dollar; get the habit; it's a good one.

The indications are that this season is going to be a record-breaker. We will need all the caddies we can get—who mean business. The season is a bit late in starting. But this week begins the real work.

The Golf Club is having a folder printed containing rules, information and general suggestions. It is to be neatly and serviceably gotten up and will be furnished free to both caddies and players.

The members of the Chicago Club who played on the Fourth celebrated by giving from twenty-five to seventy-five cents extra to their caddies, as a reward for remaining on duty that day. The boys say it was some day—for ducks.

The caddies are to be congratulated on the care that they are taking of their new shelter. The building is in charge of Ernie Olney, the assistant caddie master.

A new water cooler has been placed in the Club House, the old one has been "handed down" to the boys.

"Some day there may be an organized effort here in Petoskey for the entertainment of the summer visitors and an effort will be made to cater them in every way possible. When that time comes this city and region will be so filled with people both early and late in the season that we will hardly know where to put them." This remark by a well-known man contains more truth than poetry at least the latter part of it.

One of the things that is retarding the growth of this city and section as a resort is the lack of any organized effort to entertain the people. The successful summer resorts are the ones where all manner of amusements are provided and where the summer population are allowed to do just about as they please—Petoskey Evening News.

Charlevoix is in the same position as indicated above. What both towns needs is a concerted effort on the part of their citizens to furnish amusement for the hundreds of people who annually spend their summer here. Surprising result could be obtained if the first step will only be taken.

SELECTING A MALE FOR BREEDING PEN

In the selection of a male or males to sire a given pen of poultry there are many points to be taken into consideration—color, shape, head and so on—in order to produce a type most desirable to the owner, writes H. A. Roberts in the Country Gentleman. Hens that are deficient in some particular should be mated to males strong in that particular.

The stunted or immature bird is out of the question. A good breeding male should be large for his breed, well matured and aggressive—usually a good fighter—with a full breast, broad back and legs far apart. The cowardly bird, which shirks away at the approach of another male, or the bird that becomes unduly excited is seldom a good breeder. The desirable male is the one that is consistently in the foreground looking after his flock, always alert and active and very defiant toward an intruder or an enemy. Such a bird usually crows a great deal, has well developed spurs, a comb that is thick where it joins the head and well developed ear lobes and wattles.

Many theories have been advanced as to what conditions are best calculated to produce the highest percentage of female chicks since they are the most desirable for commercial purposes, and while there may be a certain amount of reason in some systems, they are as yet too indefinite and intangible for serious consideration. The most common, logical rule is to mate cockerels to yearling hens and cocks to pullets. The former plan is preferable, however, for a hen that has finished her first laying year and has gone through a molt is more fully matured and consequently is better equipped to produce sturdy, healthy offspring. Then, too, her egg organs have had about three months' rest during the molting period and are strong and reinvigorated when they resume activity.

After the chicks are old enough to leave the brooder it is well to put them in movable colony houses. While the chicks are small keep them inclosed near the house, but when they are big enough to range the house should be moved to new ground. The edge of a cornfield is a good place, the corn furnishing protection from hawks and crows and also shade. The illustration shows a good colony house.

Strange as it may appear to the novice, the male bird is the most important factor in the production of successful broods of chicks. In short, it may be said that his characteristics will dominate three-fourths of a hereditary influence.

Temperature of Brooders.

Chicks should not be taken from the incubator too soon. Allow them to become hardened. At the bottom of most incubators it is 90 to 95 degrees. This is the proper degree to have the brooder heat before placing the chicks in it. It is realized that it is a hard matter to keep the heat at just 90 degrees, especially in outdoor brooders, which are subject to sudden changes in the weather, many times at night.

It is safe, therefore, to run the heat a little higher, say 95 to 100 degrees. The chicks by coming to hover front can get away from too much heat, but they can never obtain heat if the brooder becomes cool, and a chilled chick as a rule never fully recovers. Too much heat weakens the chicks, but heat is less fatal than cold and is by far the lesser of the two evils.

Use Lime in the Henhouse.

Air slaked lime, if scattered in the poultry houses and under the roosts, will prove one of the best deodorizers and disinfectants to be had, and especially if the floor or premises are damp. It will dry up things in short order.

LICE ON CATTLE.

Simple Treatment For the Eradication of Insect Pests.

In going through the country I have seen many cattle that are off in flesh and in poor condition, writes a correspondent of the American Agriculturist. When you get in close touch with the owners they say: "I don't know what is the matter with my cattle. I feed them well, have a warm stable and give them good care, but they don't come any way, and I don't know what to do."

Now, just put on your glasses and examine the cattle and see if you don't find lice. If you do, just get busy and apply the following with a curry-comb. In a week or ten days apply again. Just try this: One gallon raw linseed oil, half a gallon of kerosene, two pounds of flowers of sulphur and five pounds of lard compound. Stir up the sulphur in the kerosene with the lard and mix, stirring often. With two applications your cattle will commence to gain and will not consume as much feed as before using. The amounts given in the mixture are sufficient for twelve cows.

Ration For a Bull.

A good ration for a dairy bull is plenty of good clover or alfalfa hay or mixed clover and timothy, says Hoard's Dairyman. In addition to this, feed four to eight pounds a day of grain ration consisting almost exclusively of bran and ground oats. It would also be well to feed one pound of oil meal daily. In feeding a bull it is held by some that clover is preferable to alfalfa hay, but our experience does not show clover superior to alfalfa.

Remarkable Tribute to Supreme Commander Bina M. West of the Women's Benefit Association of the Maccabees

NEW HOME OFFICE BUILDING OF THE ASSOCIATION, PORT HURON, MICH.

ON June 18 the city of Port Huron, Mich., officially welcomed home Miss Bina M. West, supreme commander of the Women's Benefit Association of the Maccabees in recognition of her remarkably efficient work for the association. The reception was in charge of Mayor Black and the city commission and was participated in by all the societies, clubs and business organizations of Port Huron. To quote the resolution of the city commission, it was a remarkable tribute to "Miss West, able worker for fraternity and humanity."

The Women's Benefit Association of the Maccabees gives its protection and fraternal interest to white women of good moral character. It is nonpolitical and nonsectarian, and dispenses its fraternity in fifty-five states and provinces.

The protection of the association can be secured for whole life, and whole life combined with disability benefits; last illness and burial benefits; also sick benefits. The rates are scientifically graded, and no member pays more than the cost of her own protection. When it is known that Miss West has, with her own hand, signed away over $12,000,000, an estimate can be formed of what this association has already done toward mitigating the dread ordeal incident to death.

Every year finds this association progressing, but the past four years have recorded its greatest advancement. Women, by securing fraternal protection, are free to seek out new fields of endeavor and become more independent and capable.

A woman's convention without one word of dissent is rather an unusual thing. This was the experience, however, of the recent eighth quadrennial convention of the association in New York. Every session was a model of business ability and parliamentary procedure, and plans were laid for the present quadrennial term which were aimed to meet the great and growing work of its 187,000 women.

Many important features were placed before the convention for decision, one being the changing of the name from the Ladies of the Maccabees of the World to the Women's Benefit Association of the Maccabees.

Another important step taken was the acceptance of plans for a handsome new home office at Port Huron, Mich. This will be a large, magnificent two story white stone building on the main street of the home city of the order, where the supreme commander, Miss B. M. West, started her project twenty-three years ago. To give the reader an idea of how this society has progressed it will be of interest to know that Miss West started out with a $150 debt, no members and unknown, to organize what today is meeting the needs of 187,000 women in the matter of home protection through fraternal insurance. Miss West has been a leader beloved and adored by her members, and as an insignia of their esteem the convention endeavored to prevail on her to accept the well earned salary of $10,000 a year for the next term. In a masterful address she declined, stating that the work of the association was uppermost in her mind, not the remuneration.

Steps were taken at this meeting of representative women to endow a state hospital service in every state, Ohio, Illinois and Michigan already having their service in satisfactory use. By this philanthropy every member requiring expert medical attention may have it free of cost to herself.

Addresses were given by Mr. Miles M. Dawson, fraternal insurance actuary of New York city, and Mr. James V. Barry, Michigan insurance commissioner, congratulated the association on the signal success it has attained.

"Your association," said Mr. Dawson, "is the first woman's benefit society in the United States to be established on a sound basis, and through the foresight of your peerless leader, Miss West, you are the largest society of your kind in the world. I congratulate you."

Burdette and Riley.

Here is a gentle little story which Strickland Gillilan told. It concerns the late Robert J. Burdette and James Whitcomb Riley and happened during Burdette's last summer on earth.

Somebody said to Riley:

"There's one thing about Bob Burdette that particularly impresses me. When he says, 'God bless you,' he means it."

"Yes," replied Riley, "and God does it when Bob asks it."—Cleveland Plain Dealer.

Early Spelling Reforms.

Thomas Galtore, rector of Rotherhithe from 1611 to 1654, seems to have been the earliest pioneer of spelling reform. This divine, who was a prominent figure in Puritan circles, started his career as a reformer by changing to Galtore "to prevent misallung." Galtore published theological treatises abounding in repulsive looking words like "galtore" (for he regarded the "u" after "g" as superfluous and other "nu spellings," such as "galtore," "excess," "del" and "tru."—London Chronicle.

Out of Line.

An edified man at the post at Fort Leavenworth was ordered to the range for the first time for target drill. Out of twenty-one chances the newcomer made none a hit.

"Oh, you dolt," exclaimed an officer standing near. "You've missed the target every time! What's the matter?"

"Well, sir," answered the recruit nonchalantly, "the only reason I can think of at present is that the person who set up my target hasn't placed it in a straight line from here."

DON'T MISTAKE THE CAUSE

Many Charlevoix People Have Kidney Trouble and Do Not Know It.

Do you have backache? Are you tired and worn out? Feel dizzy, nervous and depressed? Are the kidney secretions irregular? Highly colored; contain sediment? Likely your kidneys are at fault. Weak kidneys give warning of distress.

Heed the warning; don't delay—Use a tested kidney remedy. Read this Petoskey testimony.

Mrs. S. L. Wixon, 609 Wachtel Ave., Petoskey, Mich., says: "I have used Doan's Kidney Pills for backache and rheumatic pains and have found them to be a reliable remedy. I have received more benefit from them than from any other preparation I have ever used. Since I used them I have been free from every symptom of kidney trouble. My back has not bothered me, in fact, I have felt better in every way."

Price 50 cents at all dealers. Don't simply ask for a kidney remedy—get Doan's Kidney Pills—the same that Mrs. Wixon had. Foster—Milburn Company, Props., Buffalo, N. Y.

The most popular after dinner cheeses are Roquefort, Camembert, Stilton, Limburger, Brie, Schweitzer and Gorgonzola, all very rich and ripe. Presumably they are imported cheeses. Quite often, however, they are made in America, and dealers claim they give just as good satisfaction as the imported article.

When cheese is served both with the salad and with the coffee course a very dainty accompaniment for green salad with French dressing is this: Spread thin saltines with a mixture of grated American cheese and butter in the proportion of two tablespoons of cheese to one of butter. Dust lightly with cayenne pepper and stand for a moment or so in a quick oven. For cheese served with the final dinner course there is nothing more appropriate than hard crackers split and toasted a golden brown.

THREE MILK HINTS.

How Cleanliness, Economy, Health, May Be Furthered.

In the interests of cleanliness, economy and health it is of the utmost importance to know how to take proper care of milk. No other article of food becomes so easily contaminated. Merely to make sure that the milk you buy is pure is not sufficient, for there are countless ways in which it can be rendered unfit for use after it reaches your home.

Before removing the cap from a bottle of milk the cap and the neck of the bottle should be washed and carefully wiped with a clean cloth. The cap should not be pushed down into the milk. It may be easily removed with a sharp pointed instrument without in juring the contents.

The bottle when once open should be kept covered, and the milk should be kept in the original bottle until it is used up. The original cap should not be replaced, but instead an inverted glass may be put over the top of the bottle.

The bottle when not in use should, of course, always be left in the refrigerator, and any milk that has been poured from it into another vessel should not be poured back.

Onions and other foods having a strong odor, especially during the hot weather, very easily impart their distinctive smell to milk that is left uncovered. This is an additional reason for always keeping milk in a covered receptacle.

LIVE STOCK NOTES.

Every farmer should raise one or two colts each year. Be careful in the selection of the sire.

If a ewe is slow in coming to her milk let the lamb nurse another ewe. The ewe will doubtless have to be held for the lamb.

Don't expect big results if your sows are scrubs and were bred to a scrub sire.

The flock should get a bite of fresh grass as soon as possible, but only for a short time at first.

Keep the mare that has foaled quiet for several days. Take the chill from the drinking water.

The young pig should begin to grow from its first breath. If it does not do this it is up to the man that is managing and feeding the sow.

HOW TO MAKE GIRLOES FROM REMNANTS.

There are charming possibilities in the numerous bargain table remnants today, when a little money plus some ability will accomplish a smart waist garment in short order.

An attractive girloes can be made from a yard and a half of black messaline or any desired silk weave.

Crush an eight inch strip around the waist and divide the rest into one long strip the full eighteen inches of the material. Sew along the selvage edge on the wrong side, turn and finish each end in a point. Knot this over the girloes, which fastens with hooks and eyes a few inches to the left of the center front, and have one end six inches longer than the other.

Sew a jet tassel or ball to the end of each point. A handsome finishing may be made instead by washing two small circles of cardboard with a hole in the center with heavy rope silk.

When closely wound cut the threads between these two rings of pasteboard and tie them tightly by strands of the rope silk slipped through the cardboard and tied tightly around the center, with end long enough to make loops. Make fourteen such balls. Fasten one at each point of the skirt, except or chain attach three ends three inches long, attach a ball to each, then continue the ends for four or five inches more and finish with another ball on the end of each one.

POPULAR MECHANICS

Horsepower of a Rainfall.

Few people realize the energy in a fall of rain. On the evening of Oct. 9, 1911, there fell at Kansas City, Mo., in two hours 1.79 inches of rain. Assuming that this rain covered an area four miles square, or sixteen square miles, and that it fell from an altitude of 6,000 feet, the energy represented was about 6,300,000 horsepower hours. Were this converted into electrical energy without the usual losses it would amount to nearly 1,700,000 kilowatt hours. At 10 cents per kilowatt hour this energy would cost $170,000.—Scientific American.

To Test Pocket Watches.

We now have in this country an opportunity to secure an official standard of that commodity sometimes compared to money in the often repeated "time is money," says the Scientific American. The Bureau of Standards, official measurer of the United States, undertakes for a fixed fee ranging from 50 cents to $5 to report on and certify as to pocket watches. The most delicate test, known as Class A, involves the running of the watch for fifty-four days in a series of periods in various positions and at different temperatures.

Deflecting Auto Headlights.

The only light that is useful in automobile driving at night is that which is thrown on the roadway. This effect may be obtained by painting the lower segment of the concave reflector and letting the rays that strike the upper part and are directed downward do all the lighting, says Automobile Dealer. A simple method of avoiding the objectionable glare is to direct the light downward by bending the lamp supports so that the principal rays will strike the roadway about fifty feet ahead of the car.

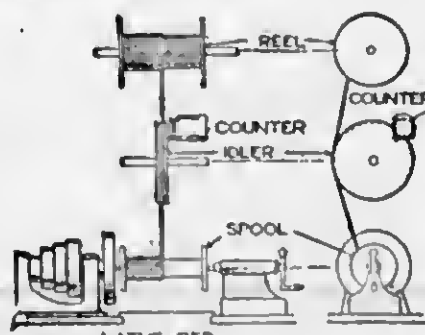

Testing the Compression.

When a cylinder fails to hold compression it is not always easy to tell whether leakage is taking place past the valves or past the piston rings, says the Automobile Dealer. If the breather, or crank case compression release pipe, is examined when the engine is pulled over compression when hot it will be found that at each compression stroke only gas will be blown out of the breather pipe if the leak is past the piston. It is obviously of no use making this test when the engine is cold.

Measuring Wire Wound on a Spool.

When winding magnet spools on a lathe the exact amount of wire used can be easily determined by means of the device shown in the illustration, says Popular Mechanics.

The large reel from which the wire is obtained is conveniently placed on a loose mandrel, or rod, near the lathe and in line with the spool which is to be wound. A grooved idler wheel, the exact diameter of which is known, is supported between the spool and wire reel so it may freely revolve. The

THE DEED OF GIFT.

Archbishop Ireland tells the following story of a total abstinence pledge that had a fixed economic value:

"I was strolling on a summer evening along one of the streets in the upper town of St. Paul, Minnesota. The figure of a friend of mine was seen hammering a piece of wood in front of a newly built cottage. I approached with the salute: 'Well, Patrick, what are you doing here?' 'Industrious,' answered he, 'putting some last touches to this house of mine.' 'This house of yours?' I replied. 'Haven't you had the money to pay for this fine building?' 'Yes, indeed, this house is paid for and so is the next house, mine also; one to live in, the other to be rented to some neighbor.' My wonder grew. 'Why, how is this, Patrick? I remember well when you had very little money.' 'So do I remember,' replied Patrick, 'but I have found the money. You, Father Ireland, gave it to me.' Still more did my wonder grow. 'Come inside,' continued Patrick, and in an instant, following his quick pace, I was upstairs in Patrick's bedroom. 'Look here,' he said, 'this is the deed of gift.' I looked. On the wall above the bed, nicely framed, was the document, 'I promise to abstain during my lifetime from all intoxicating drinks. Signed, Patrick.' Witnessed, John Ireland.' The mystery of the two houses, the property of Patrick, was explained. With gladness hand I saluted him; with warm heart I prayed for further success to the cause of total abstinence."

OF INTEREST TO MASONS.

The attention of the Masonic order has been called to the fact that the sale of liquor in hotels and saloons on Sunday is a Masonic crime. Following is the text of a letter sent by Attorney Joe Beatty Burtt, chairman of the crime prevention committee of the Fraternal Education association to the various Masonic bodies in Chicago:

"Dear Friends and Brothers: Doubtless you have noticed in the daily press that the Chicago loop hotels (except the Blackstone and Grant Northern) have formed a combination to violate the law of Illinois. The managers of some of these hotels are thirty-second degree Masons and belong to Oriental Consistories. Since the violation of state laws by a member of the Masonic fraternity is a Masonic crime, I am calling your attention to this open, brazen, and notorious offense of some of our ignorant and less informed brethren with the hope that they will overcome their own selfish blindness and correct an error of their ways. I am also informed that some of the Masonic lodges in Chicago are deriving profit from the lawlessness that prevails in our city. No doubt you will agree with me that the time is ripe, in Chicago at any rate, when the enjoining process should be applied to commercialized fraternity."

THE RED FLAG.

An engineer gave his little girl a small red flag to play with and explained that on the road the red flag signifies danger. "Would you stop your train if you saw a red flag on the track?" she asked. "Yes," he said, "or there might be an accident." After her papa had left, the little girl thought of what she might do to help, and at last she thought of the red flag, and what her papa had told her it stands for. Going to the sideboard, she firmly fastened the flag to the decanter, and then went to bed satisfied. The father came home, went to the sideboard for the usual nighttime, but saw the flag and understood and heeded the warning.

NOT LIQUID BREAD.

In a pamphlet entitled, "Alcohol and the Power of Resistance," distributed among the recruits of the German army, the following statement concerning beer is made:

"There is no justification for calling beer 'liquid bread'; a glass of heavy beer costing 25 pennings, has no more nourishment than a piece of cheese costing one penny. Almost all excesses and disturbances in the army are traced to drink. It is mostly beer that causes the mischief. Beer is not the harmless drink that it is supposed to be."

ENEMY IS RECOGNIZED.

Trying times have searched out the weaknesses caused by the demon rum and the evil that it does stands apparent. From the ignorant Villa in Mexico to the king of England, from the president of the French republic to the czar of all the Russias, men of intelligence and concern for their fellow man have recognized the enemy of a sound body and a good mind.—Chicago Tribune.

BEFORE AND AFTER.

The public officials of Clarkburg, W. Va., are quoted by the Clarkburg Telegram as saying that but one-seventh as many arrests were made in the city during July, August, September and October under prohibition as were made during the corresponding months of last year. Three members of the police force have been cut off as a result of prohibition.

Ladies First.

Here is a little story of the late Admiral Fraunce, told by Dr. Ernest Young in his book of travel sketches entitled "From Russia to Siam".
When the steamer anchored off Canton the guides, as is their custom, boarded her at once. The admiral and his friends chose their guide and prepared to follow him. The admiral was about to descend the ladder and get into a native sampan when the guide pushed him back, saying:
"Ladies first."

"Oh, that doesn't matter," said the admiral. "I'm an old man."
"Ole unu!" quickly responded the Chinaman. "Ole unu all more ought to know unchee better."

Scotch Profits.
"We have decided," said the head of a Glasgow firm, "to conduct our business in future on the profit sharing principle. We shall begin at once on the basis of last year's results."
"We are delighted to hear it," replied the foreman, standing for the man. "May we ask what were the last year's results?"
"We lost a thousand pounds," said the employer, "and, therefore, on the profit sharing principle, there will be a reduction of 10 per cent in your wages."—Dumdee Advertiser.

HAD LIVED HERE OVER FIFTY YEARS

Death Take Robert A. Miller, Well Known in Country.

Few Men Occupied Higher Place in Esteem of Fellow Citizens—Funeral Sunday.

Robert A. Miller, one of the prominent and highly respected residents of Ironton, died on Friday last at the home of his daughter, Mrs. Matt Allen.
He was born in Baravia, Germany, May 13, 1836, and was 83 years of age at the time of his death. In 1869 he came to what is now Charlevoix county. The same year he went to Beaver Island, where he engaged in fishing for about seven years. In 1864 he took up a homestead in Marlon township, which he created into a good farm, remaining there until 1881, when he removed to Ironton, where he had since made his home.

In politics, Mr. Miller was a Republican and held the office of township treasurer in his home township, was clerk for ten years, and a member of the board of superintendents of the poor for over 20 years, during which time he had charge of the county poor farm for ten years.

Mr. Miller was married on Beaver Island to Miss Roxanna E. Rice, who died April 25, 1896. To this union four children were born. The two surviving children are Mrs. Mathias Allen of Eveline township, at whose home he died, and a son, Archie, who lives in California.

Mr. Miller was a member of Charlevoix Lodge No. 86, and during the earlier days was one of its most active members. Few men have more faithfully performed the duties of life that have been assigned them than Mr. Miller, and few men occupied a higher place in the esteem of his fellow citizens.

Funeral services were held from the home of his daughter in Eveline township, Sunday, at 2:00 o'clock, Rev. C. E. Taggart officiating. The pall bearers were members of the Masonic order. Interment at Brookside cemetery.

Lee Gilbert and Hans Jensen entertained about forty guests at the home of the former, Monday evening. The home was appropriately decorated with flags, lanterns and bunting. Refreshments were served, after an evening enjoyably spent shooting off various kinds of fireworks.

Old Get-rich-quick Schemes.
About the year 1720 a great many Englishmen invested millions of money to companies which were organized for such objects as, "Wrecks to Be Fished For on the Irish Coast," "For Making Oil From Sunflower Seeds," "For Importing a Number of Large Jackasses From Spain," "For a Wheel of Perpetual Motion" and, most extraordinary of all, "For an Undertaking Which Shall in Due Time Be Revealed." The promoter of this last company received more than 1,000 subscriptions during the morning on which the offering was made, and disappeared the same afternoon with more than 2,000 guineas.—World's Work.

MILLIONS OF FISH ARE PLANTED

Michigan Replenishing Her Streams and Lakes With Fish.

134,660,835 Members of Finny Tribe Placed in Waters of State During Past Two Years.

During the calendar years 1913 and 1914 there were planted by the Michigan fish commission in the waters of the state 134,660,835 fish, from small fry up to fingerlings.

They were scattered into almost every township in the state and the commission is certain that a large majority of them were able to hold their own and live after being placed in the water.

Out of that huge number but a little over 5,000,000 were anything but inland fish. Lake trout in the output were 5,250,500 but some of these were planted in inland waters.

The report of the commission which has just given to Governor Ferris, states that there are certain people in the state who ask for fish fry for planting purposes and yet do not plant them. It is intimated that hereafter each person who gets an allotment of fish will have to be personally known to the commission, or at least recommended by somebody who can guarantee that the fish will be taken care of.

Fish Distributed.

The 134,000,000 fish distributed in the two years were classified as follows:

Brook trout, 12,183,000; rainbow trout, fry, 7,252,000; fingerlings, 487,700; German trout, 814,000; lake trout, 5,250,000; small mouth black bass, fry, 1,816,000; fingerlings, 653,050; large mouth black bass, fry, 2,834,500; fingerlings, 125,300; yearlings, 2,160; wall-eyed pike, 54,965; 000 warmouth bass, 99,850; bluegills, 112,900; landlocked salmon, 22,000; grayling, 100,000.

Bring Grayling Back.

The commission is trying to bring back the grayling to Michigan waters. Fifty thousand of them were planted each year in the hope that once more this game fish could be introduced to live in this state. The grayling left Michigan streams some years ago upon the advent, in large numbers, of the brook trout.

In 1913, 50,000 graylings were placed in the north branch of the Au Sable river in Crawford county, while last year 50,000 were divided between the same stream and the Otto river in Houghton county.

WILL WELCOME PIKE TOURISTS

Estimated at Least Forty Cars Will Meet Them at Norwood.

Every Auto Driver in City Urged to Do His Part—Road Boosters to Give Short Talks.

Preparations are in full swing to make Thursday's reception of the West Michigan Pike tourists not only come up to the highest expectations of the visitors, but to exceed them and last year's big event.

The local committee have sent out notices to all automobile owners in the city, urging them to meet the tourists at Norwood, Thursday forenoon at 10:00 and escort them to the city. It is estimated that at least forty cars will be in line. Interest has increased since last year all along the line and more cars are to participate in the complete tour than in any previous years. Locally enthusiasm is also stronger and with the added number of cars purchased during the year, together with those owned by our summer visitors, an imposing procession of cars is a certainty.

These annual tours have been productive of far reaching results. They have formed very enjoyable outings for those taking part in them. They have made western Michigan known to many auto owners from other states and greatly helped the resort business along the lakes. They have created an unprecendented interest in the desirability and necessity of good highways. Localities with good roads were given wide publicity of a favorable nature, which served as an incentive to other communities to get busy and improve their roads. As a result fully sixty per cent of the West Michigan Pike is now completed, in addition to which the lateral roads are becoming of increased importance and are being improved at a rapid rate.

A number of good speakers will be present and short talks will be made. It is the earnest endeavor of the committee to have as large a number of cars in line as possible, and owners are urged to co-operate with them.

MANAGES BOTH HOUSES

Manager C. V. Miles of the Majestic Opens Up Charlevoix Theatre.

One thing that can be said about Charlevoix, and that is that we have one of the best moving picture shows in the north. Manager Miles is to be congratulated in the manner in which he conducts the business at the Majestic. A good, clean program every night is the plan under which he operates. Special features are shown several times a week, and the size of the crowds of people attending every night is evidence that he is giving satisfaction.

During the summer months a matinee will be held at the Majestic every afternoon, except Sunday. The theatre will be opened Sunday evening and special features suitable for the day shown.

Manager Miles has also taken charge of the Charlevoix Theatre, formerly operated by John Loskot, and will have it under his charge the balance of the season.

For an evening's amusement it is absolutely safe to attend either of the two places.

4TH OF JULY CASUALTIES

Twenty-nine Dead and Over a Thousand Injured This Year's Toll

Twenty-nine dead; one thousand one hundred and ten injured. Considering that this peaceful land had forty-eight hours in which to prove, with noise and flame, how dearly it loves to be free and independent the Fourth of July casualties are not discouraging. They exceed those of last year when the Fourth was celebrated on the Fourth instead of on the 4th and 5th and evening of the 3d. The difference may be charged to the calendar. If these states are truly interested in the conservation of human life they will arrange that hereafter Sunday Fourth of July shall be celebrated on one day and one day only.

FLOUR WILL BE NO LOWER

General Opinion of Dealers Is That Price Has Reached Minimum.

Flour dealers generally believe that the price for bread flour has about touched its lowest level, though some say it may go still lower.

During the last four weeks the price has dropped about $2 a barrel wholesale, and from 75 cents to $1 and $1.50 at retail.

"Buyers are waiting for the new wheat from the southwest and there is a decided lull in foreign buying," said one flour dealer. "With the greatest American wheat harvest the world has known in sight, estimated by government experts to bring 950,000,000 bushels, a considerable drop in the price of flour is only natural."

In the last 23 years, without exception, the price of wheat has increased, between the periods from June to September, from 5 to 60 cents a bushel, causing an increase in the price of a barrel of flour of just four times that amount. It takes four bushels to make a barrel.

While the retail price has not dropped so much as the wholesale, this is accounted for by the fact that when flour was highest during the winter the retailers did not increase the price in proportion to the rise in the wholesale rates. The present retail prices are more nearly what they should be, judging by the price of wheat and the figures quoted by the wholesalers, the retailers say.

ENTERTAINED WITH MARTIAL MUSIC

G. A. R. Veterans and Families Spend Enjoyable Evening.

Charles H. Minnis Host of Newly Made Friends—Former Police Captain at Lansing.

On Saturday evening, July 10, the old soldiers and their families assembled at the home of Charles H. Minnis, 211 Antrim street, where they partook of a bountiful repast and passed a most enjoyable evening.

Mr. Minnis is late of Detroit, but became much attached to our city and surroundings, and was especially captivated by one of our ladies, whom he quite recently married.

Mr. Minnis organized the famous Minnis Bros. Martial Band, composed of Jerome, Frank, Homer and Charles H. Minnis, of whom only Homer and himself remain. They raised a thousand recruits for the Civil war and joined the 20th Michigan Infantry in 1862, participating in the battles of the Potomac. For nine years he was captain of the capital police force at Lansing, and became acquainted with most of the prominent men of the state.

His locks whitened, but he still stands erect and has the unmistakable military bearing that is recognized in some of the old veterans. Mr. Minnis led the parade in the late G. A. R. reunion at Detroit, playing on the same old fife that awoke the southland and smote the ears of the Jonnies on many fields.

He entertained the old "vets" with music from the same old fife, and the notes as rendered might well be the echo of those that sounded along the battle line over fifty years ago.

Charlevoix is fortunate in gaining a musician of the qualities of Charles H. Minnis.

Growing Sweet Clover in Western Michigan

Samuel Willis of Thompsonville Tells of His Early Experiences—Interesting Information.

The purpose of this article is to give Michigan farmers a few facts from my experience in growing sweet clover. Trusting that its usefulness will be appreciated by all who are interested in the upbuilding of the farm. As to the question of the real value of sweet clover, there is bound to be exceptions and differences of opinion and all will not agree with me when I say that it is to be the greatest plant known to man. But its field of usefulness is large and it will bring more wealth to Michigan than all the other legumes combined; in the way of re-claiming worn out lands.

This may not be particularly interesting to you, but right here pardon me for saying that probably I am the first man in Michigan, who took kindly enough to sweet clover to put it in a cultivated field. I started in 7 or 8 years ago and was threatened with arrest for growing a noxious weed; the highway commissioner and several of my neighbors called upon me and told me that I must destroy the crop at once; and never grow more of it; that I had no more right to sow sweet clover than Canada thistles; that the country had weeds enough without my sowing them, and they thought that a man was liable to a fine or imprisonment for such an act.

To outwit this highway commissioner who was so close on my trail for growing noxious weeds, I called the plant French Clover, and told him that it was Imported seed, for which I had paid the sum of $14 for 50 lbs.; suggesting to him that he better not destroy the crop until he knew more about the plant. This talk saved my sweet clover crop, and that is why I gave the farm at Thompsonville the name "French Clover Farm."

Before mentioning the merits of sweet clover let me say in advance, that ever since the early history of farming, the methods have been more or less a sort of LAND ROBBING. A mining of the soil, as if we were seeing how much we could take out of the soil and how little we could put back. Now clovers are the foundation of farming, as well as the foundation of agricultural wealth; the more clover the richer the country.

I have at different times found considerable fault with the farm lands of Michigan, and have even made the remark that I did not consider some of the land in this state, of any more value for farming purposes than the same amount of clear sky; and have several times made the remark, of which I have since been ashamed, that the Creator when he finished his work in 6 days, could have put in the 7th to very good advantage in fixing up some of the soil in the United States into better conditions for farming. I may not be quite correct but I think that the government survey gives about seven or eight hundred different kinds of soil throughout the United States, and I think most of these are found in Michigan.

But with the various kinds of soils the wise Creator also gave to each its native trees and plants. We find wet land trees and dry land trees, wet land plants and dry plants; but, he also gave the world ONE general purpose plant—SWEET CLOVER.

Sweet clover is known by various names as—Melilotus, Bokhara, Tree Clover, Bce Clover, Giant Alfalfa, Wild Alfalfa, and even the Indians have always made use of this plant in the weaving of baskets calling it "sweet grass" on account of its pleasant odor.

There are several kinds of sweet clover—there is the small yellow blossom variety, which is an annual, another blossom variety which is biennial, and the white blooming variety which is also a biennial and the most valuable of the three, and the only one that I would recommend sowing.

The merits of the white blossom variety, as a honey plant are already well known, but its value as a soil builder is only just beginning to be realized. It is a fact that it readily grows on every type of soil, from the heaviest clays to the very light sandy soil, including clay (Continued on page 4)

LIVE STOCK HUSBANDRY

HORSES IN SPRING.

Changes of Ration Should Be Made Slowly and With Care.

When spring work approaches the feed can gradually be increased, not perhaps to full working ration, but materially above the winter ration. Says Professor Van Es, North Dakota experiment station, in horses which during the winter have acquired what we commonly call a "fat belly," the roughage ration must be shortened and the shortage compensated for by a corresponding increase above the normal increase of the winter ration.

In all horse feeding we still must attach the greatest importance to hay and oats, and in preparing the horse for spring work we should continue ourselves to these articles of diet. It is proper to add a little corn to the ration after work is well under way and when the horses commence to show a little wear and tear on this account. When work actually begins the horses must be used with considerable caution, because no matter how judiciously we have fed and managed them during the winter the lack of muscular strain will have produced a little "softness," which can only be overcome by brushing the animals by degrees up to their accustomed labor capacity.

CLOVER FOR SWINE.

Breed Sows and Their Litters Should Be Fed on Pasture.

The number of pigs that can be kept on an acre of clover pasture naturally depends upon the kind and size of the pigs and the natural fertility and productivity of the land on which the clover is growing, writes W. F. Purdue in the National Stockman. Much also depends on the weather, for if there is an abundance of rainfall more feed will be produced on a given area than during a dry season.

In estimating the number of animals that an acre of pasture will support it should be remembered that individual of the improved breeds that have been well handled and fed on a variety of feeds will eat more grass and get more out of it than animals that have been confined in yards and pens and fed almost entirely on concentrates. With the latter class the stomachs have not been expanded, and they are not capable of holding much coarse feed, and consequently such pigs cannot give as good returns for grass consumed.

It is safe to say that pigs weighing from 125 to 150 pounds will consume ten to twelve quarts of grass per day while being fed slops and a fairly good ration of grain feeds. An acre of clover growing on good rich soil in the early part of the season will furnish pasture for at least ten pigs of the size mentioned. Four or five brood sows, with their litters of pigs, can also be pastured on an acre of clover. Good judgment necessarily must be used in this matter. Overpasturing is not desirable, but an effort should be made to keep enough animals on each acre of pasture to keep the grass eaten down before it attains a rank growth.

While the Berkshire pig is classed as belonging to the hard type it is claimed for him that if fed a proper flesh forming ration he will produce bacon of the finest quality. In fact, some sections of the United States prefer the Berkshire pork to that of any other breed. Advocates of the Berkshire have never advertised him as a bacon hog because of the fact that in the minds of many people the term "bacon hog" is associated with the long nosed, staid shaggy hog possessing inferior feeding qualities. The illustration shows a Berkshire boar of excellent type.

Swine eat only the short and tender grass. Few of the rank and coarse stems are consumed. In cases of sufficient number of animals to keep the grass eaten down cannot be kept in a field, as soon as the clover blossoms it should be mowed and cured for hay, after which a new growth will start, which the pigs will relish. In this way the maximum results from the clover will be secured.

Another point that should be considered is that in order to get the greatest benefits from the pasture grain must be fed in connection therewith as the grass alone furnishes only a little more than a sustaining ration, and progress without some grain will be slow. Where hogs have the run of good clover pasture it has been variously determined that they should have from one-half to two-thirds as much corn as when corn alone is fed.

BETTER FARMING.

Three essential things lie at the bottom of every forward farm movement as its aim and means—better farming, better husbandry, better living.

Farm better than you may have more to sell. Sell better than you may get better rewards for your labor. Thus live better.

The best living is living that makes labor effective. There is no happiness in idleness, and there is no satisfaction in toiling or in shuffling work or in dragging through it "like a quarry slave at night scoured to his dungheap."—House and Farm.

CASH OR SHARE RENT.

The Advantages and Disadvantages of Two Different Systems.

Prepared by H. H. Hubbard of Wisconsin agricultural experiment station.

"Shall I rent a farm on shares or shall I pay cash?"

This is the question which many young men who are just striking out for themselves are asking.

The answer is determined quite largely by circumstances and by local conditions, but there are a few general truths which apply in nearly all cases. The advantages and disadvantages of the two systems are thus summarized:

Cash rent gives to the tenant greater independence, for during the extent of his lease he is more nearly his own master, the business of running the farm largely concerning no one but himself. Rising grain prices during recent years have also made the system more profitable to the tenant than share renting. Another advantage in paying cash for the use of a piece of land is the inducement offered for the tenant to put forth every effort to get as much out of the soil as possible and to strive for maximum production. Any increase in output means greater profit for the tenant and need not be shared with the owner, as is the case under the share system of renting.

Share renting, on the other hand, gives the tenant the benefit of having a partner who in many cases has had considerable business experience. This quite frequently is a valuable asset, especially for the young farmer. The owner who rents on shares pays more attention to his farm and will, as a rule, have better and furnish better buildings than the man who rents on cash. From the standpoint of the renter perhaps the greatest advantage in share renting is that for him it lessens the element of risk. In bad years he pays a small rent or none at all. In good years he may pay a relatively high rent.

About 14 per cent of Wisconsin farms are rented as compared with 41 per cent in Illinois, 38 per cent in Iowa and 21 per cent in Minnesota. This lower percentage of tendency in Wisconsin is due partly to the cheapness of the land and to the fact that the dairy business does not lend itself well to most systems of renting. There is a growing tendency, however, for tenant and owner to buy a dairy herd together. This makes the running of the farm somewhat of a partnership affair and seems to work well.

How Hog Cholera Comes.

First.—Pigs and hogs purchased from an infected herd or coming in contact with those from infected farms or running over grounds that were occupied by cholera infected hogs within four months.

Second.—Infected streams may communicate the disease to the hogs by low the source of infection.

Third.—The disease may be carried in feed, implements used on the farm and on the feet and clothing of persons from infected herds and premises.

Fourth.—Hogs, birds, buzzards, pigeons, chickens, etc., that have access to diseased premises or diseased carcasses may transport the hog cholera virus.

Fifth.—Any dead animal, whether it be a horse, cow, dog, chicken or hog, if permitted to remain unburied, is a source of infection, as buzzards and dogs feeding upon this carcass may have come from an infected farm—Kansas Experiment Station.

Regular Milking.

If you doubt the necessity about milking cows with exact regularity try the regular and irregular system on two of your cows and see for yourself. Milk one regularly to the minute each day and let the time vary for the other cow from half an hour to three hours and you will then see how soon the second cow will fall off in her milk.

PEG O'MY HEART

By J. Hartley Manners

A Comedy of Youth Founded by Mr. Manners on His Great Play of the Same Title—Illustrations From Photographs of the Play

Copyright, 1913, by Dodd, Mead & Company

PROLOGUE.

A romping, madcap, bewitching Irish girl, as Irish as St. Patrick's day in the morning, is turned over to the care of aristocratic English relatives. They are stiff and artificial, and she is as sweet and natural as a healthy country girl can be. They dislike her, but Peg holds her own with jaunty pride and in the end, by her generosity and big heartedness, wins them over, and what is more, wins her fortune, and what is still more, wins a very gallant lover. This, in brief, is the story of a play which by its originality, sweetness and charm has been one of the most phenomenal successes New York has seen in a long time. The author of the play has turned it into a novel, so sympathetically, so brilliantly, that Peg as a heroine of fiction is as lovable as she was on the stage.

CHAPTER. I.

The Irish Agitator and Angela. FAITH, there's no man says more and knows less than yourself, I'm thinking.

"About Ireland, yer riverence?"

"And everything else, Mr. O'Connell."

"Is that criticism or just temper, father?"

"It's both, Mr. O'Connell."

"Sure it's the good judge you must be of ignorance, Father Cahill."

"And what might that name?"

"Ye live so much with it, father."

"I'm looking at it and listening to it now, Frank O'Connell."

"Then it's a miracle has happened, father. To see and hear oneself at the same time is indeed a miracle."

"Don't provoke the man of God!"

"Not for the world," replied the other weekly, "but meself a child of St. Anna."

"And that's what ye are. And ye'd have others like yourself. But ye won't while I've a tongue in me head and a strong stick in me hand."

O'Connell looked at him with a mischievous twinkle in his blue-gray eyes: "Yer eloquence seems to make some thin' to back it up, I'm thinking."

Father Cahill breathed hard. He was a splendid type of the Irish parish priest of the old school. Gifted with a vivid power of eloquence as a preacher and a heart as tender as a woman's toward the poor and the wretched, he had been for many years idolized by the whole community of the village of M., in County Clare. But of late there was a growing feeling of discontent among the younger generation. They lacked the respect their elders so willingly gave. They asked questions instead of answering them. They began to throw themselves against Father Cahill's express wishes and commands, into the fight for home rule under the masterly statesmanship of Charles Stuart Parnell. Already more than one prominent speaker had come into the village and sown the seeds of temporal and spiritual unrest. Father Cahill opposed these men to the utmost of his power. He saw, as so many farsighted priests did, the legacy of bloodshed and desolation that would follow any direct action by the Irish against the British government. Though the blood of the patriot beat in Father Cahill's veins, the well being of the people who had grown up with him was near to his heart. He was their priest, and he could not bear to think of men he had known as children being beaten and maimed by constabulary and sent to prison afterward in the fight for self government.

To his horror that day he met Frank Owen O'Connell, one of the best known of all the younger agitators, in the main street of the little village.

O'Connell's backsliding had been one of Father Cahill's bitterest regrets. He had closed O'Connell's father's eyes in death and had taken care of the boy as well as he could. But at the age of fifteen the youth left the village that had so many wretched memories of hardship and struggle and worked his way to Dublin. It was many years before Father Cahill heard of him again. He had developed meanwhile into one of the most daring of all the fervid speakers in the sacred cause of Irish liberty.

And Father Cahill was going to hear from Frank Owen O'Connell again, though little did he reckon on the importance that the present young and comparatively untutored reformer would achieve.

Wilberforce Kingsnorth, wealthy, imperious Englishman, left three children—Nathaniel, who in a large measure inherited much of his father's doubtless will and hard headiness;

Monica, the elder daughter, and Angela, the younger.

Nathaniel was the old man's favorite. While still a youth he had been into the boy all the tenets of business, morality and politics that had made Wilberforce prosperous.

Upright in his name, a sturdy grasp of life, an unyielding attitude toward those beneath him and an abiding reverence for law and order and fealty to the throne—these were the foundations on which the father built Nathaniel's character.

Next in point of regard came the elder daughter, Monica. Patriarchal in feature, haughty in manner, exclusive by nature, she had the true Kingsnorth air. She had no disturbing "ideas," no yearning for things not of her station. She was contented with the world as it had been made for her and seemed duly proud and grateful to have been born a Kingsnorth.

She was an excellent musician, rode fairly to hounds, bestowed prizes at the local charities with grace and distinction—she became a Kingsnorth—and looked coolly out at the world from behind the impenetrable barriers of an old name.

When she married Frederick Chichester, the rising barrister, connected with six county families, it was a proud day for old Kingsnorth. His family had originally made their money in trade. The Chichesters had accumulated a fortune by professions. The distinction in England is marked.

Frederick Chichester came of a long line of illustrious lawyers. One had even reached the distinction of being made a judge. He belonged to an honorable profession. The old man was overjoyed.

He made a handsome settlement on his eldest daughter on her marriage and felt he had done well by her, even as she had by him.

Five years after Monica's birth Angela unexpectedly was born to the Kingsnorths. A delicate, sickly infant, it seemed as if the splendid blood of the family had expended its vigor on the elder children. Angela needed constant attention to keep her alive. From treacherous infancy she grew into delicate youth. She seemed a child apart.

Not needing her, Kingsnorth did not love her. He gave her a form of tolerant affection. Too fragile to mix with others, she was brought up at home. Tutors furnished her education. The winters she passed abroad with her mother. When her mother died she spent them with relations or friends. The grim dampness of the English climate was too rigorous for a life that needed sunshine.

Angela had nothing in common with either her brother or her sister. She avoided them and they her. They did not understand her. She understood them only too well. A nature that craved for sympathy and affection—as the frail so often do—was repulsed by those to whom affection was but a form and sympathy a term of reproach.

It was on her first homecoming since her mother's death that her attention was really drawn to her father's Irish possessions.

By a curious coincidence she returned home on a day when Wilberforce Kingsnorth had delivered an electrical speech, invoking Providence to interpose in the settlement of the Irish difficulty. He was noted for his hatred of the Irish. It was the one topic of conversation throughout dinner. And it was during this dinner that Angela for the first time really angered her father and raised a barrier between them that lasted until the day of his death.

The old man had laughed coarsely at the remembrance of his speech on the previous night and flicked his lips at the thought of it.

Monica, who was visiting her father for a few days, smiled in agreeable sympathy. Nathaniel nodded cheerfully.

From her father's side Angela asked quietly:

"Have you ever been in Ireland, father?"

"No, I have not," answered the old man sharply. "And, what is more, I never intend to go there."

"Do you know anything about the Irish?" persisted Angela.

"Do? More than the English government does. Don't I own land there?"

"I mean do you know anything about the people?" insisted Angela.

"I know them to be a lot of thieving, rascally scoundrels, too lazy to work and too dishonest to pay their way even when they have the money."

"Is that all you know?"

"Isn't it enough?" His voice rose shrilly. It was the first time for years any one had dared use those two hated words "Ireland" and "Irish" at his table. Angela must be checked and at once.

"It wouldn't be enough for me if I had the responsibilities and duties of a landlord. To be the owner of an estate should be to act as the people's friend, their father, their adviser in times of plenty and their comrade in times of sorrow."

"Indeed! And pray where did you learn all that, miss?" asked the astonished parent.

Without noticing the interruption or the question, Angela went on: "Why deny a country its own government when England is practically governed by its countrymen? Is there any position of prominence today in England that isn't filled by Irishmen? Think! Our commander in chief is Irish; our lord high admiral is Irish; there are the defenses of the English in the hands of two Irishmen, and yet you call them thieving and rascally scoundrels!"

Kingsnorth tried to speak; Angela raised her voice:

"Turn to your judges—the lord chief is an Irishman. Look at the house of commons. Our laws are passed or defeated by the Irish vote, and yet so libidinally ignorant and obstinate is our insular prejudice that we refuse them the favors they do us—governing themselves as well as England."

Kingsnorth looked at his daughter against. Treason in his own house! His child speaking the two most hated of all words at his own dinner table and in his father's house! He could scarcely believe it. He looked at her a moment and then thundered:

"How dare you! How dare you!"

Angela smiled a little unamused tolerant smile as she looked frankly at her father and answered:

"This is exactly the old fashioned tone we English take to anything we don't understand. And that is why other countries are leaving us in the race. There is a nation living within a few hours' journey from our doors, yet millions of English people are as ignorant of them as if they lived in Saegambria." She paused, looked once more straight into her father's eyes and said, "And you, father, seem to be as ignorant as the worst of them!"

"Angela!" cried her sister in horror.

Nathaniel laughed good naturedly, leaned across to Angela and said:

"I see our little sister has been reading the sensational magazines. Yes?"

"I've done more than that," replied Angela. "In June a month ago were two English members of parliament who had taken the trouble to visit the country they were supposed to assist in governing. They told me that a condition of misery existed throughout the whole of Ireland that was incredible under a civilized government."

"Rascals, eh?" snipped her father.

"No; Conservatives. One of them had once held the office of chief secretary for Ireland and was Ireland's most bitter prosecutor until he visited the country. When he saw the wretchedness of her people he stopped his stringent methods and began eating about for some way of lessening the poor people's torment."

"The more shame to him to talk like that to a girl. And, what's more, you had no right to listen to him. A Conservative indeed! A line one he must be!"

"He is. I don't see why the Liberal party should have all the enlightenment and the Conservative party all the bigotry."

"Don't anger your father!" pleaded Monica.

"Why, little Angela has come back with a quite a revolutionary," said Nathaniel.

"Leave the table!" shouted her father.

Without a word Angela got up quietly and left the room. Her manner was entirely unmoved. She had spoken from her inmost convictions. The fact that they were opposed to her father was immaterial. She loathed tyranny, and his method of shutting the mouths of those who disagreed with him was particularly obnoxious to her. It was also most ineffectual with her. From childhood she had always spoken as she felt. No discipline checked her. Freedom of speech as well as freedom of thought was as natural and essential to her as breathing.

From that time she saw but little of her father. When he died he left her to her brother's care. Kingsnorth made no absolute provision for her. She was to be dependent on Nathaniel.

When the time came that she seemed to wish to marry, if her brother approved of the match, he should make a handsome settlement on her.

In response to her request Nathaniel allowed her to go with him to Ireland on his tour of inspection.

Mr. Chichester was actively engaged at the Old Bailey on an important criminal case, so Monica also joined them.

Everything Angela saw in Ireland appealed to her quick sympathy and gentle heart. It was just as she had thought and read and listened to. On every side she saw a kindly people borne down by the weight of poverty, lives ruined by sickness and the lack of nourishment—a splendid race perishing through misgovernment and intolerant ignorance.

Angela went about among the people and made friends with them. They were chary at first of taking her to their hearts. She was of the hated Saxon race. What was she doing there—she, the sister of their, till now, absentee landlord? She soon won them over by her appealing voice and kindly interest.

All this Angela did in direct opposition to her brother's wishes and her sister's exhortations.

The morning of the meeting she had ridden some miles to visit a poor family. Out of five three were in bed with low fever. She got a doctor for them, gave them money to buy necessities, and, with a promise to return the next day, she rode away.

The Spirit That Wins

PERSISTENCE and doggedness oftenest bring results. One of our depositors started a savings account four different times. Three times he was forced to withdraw his savings to pay for life necessities, but he is still with us and now has a wall of dollars between himself and possible sickness or want. His is the spirit that wins against all odds. And his savings account with us helps.

One of the most vital and inexcusable errors a legislative body can commit is to pass a law containing a discrepancy in the date it shall take effect.

The Democratic congress incorporated just such a blunder in the "war tax" law.

Section 21 of this law declares that "the stamp taxes prescribed on the articles provided for in Schedule B shall attach to all such articles thirty days after the approval of the act."

Schedule B itself, however, provides that "all articles and preparations provided for which are in the hands of manufacturers or dealers on December 1, 1914, shall be subject to the payment of the stamp taxes herein," etc.

The two provisions are absolutely contradictory. When the Treasury Department came to enforce the law it was unable to harmonize the two conflicting dates. Congress had adjourned and it was impossible to correct the blunder by proper legislative action.

A forced interpretation was the only alternative. The Department arbitrarily fixed the date of enforcement, virtually assuming a function that belonged only to the legislative body.

The whole subject of financial legislation seems to have been a fatal stumbling block to the Democrats. While they have blundered in scores of other important measures, this tendency has been specially emphasized in every statute dealing with the receipt or expenditure of money to conduct the affairs of government.

The last Congress passed three laws notably designed to raise money,—first, the tariff law; second, the income tax law; and third, the "war tax." It is significant that the revenues from each fell short of the amount needed, thereby contributing to the treasury deficit, and has led to a mass of expensive litigation because the legislative intent could be determined only by judicial interpretation.

It is reported that instructions have been issued by the Secretary of the Treasury that after July 1, no purchases will be made of sites selected and approved for public buildings. This is another method of minimizing the deficit apparent at the end of the fiscal year.

Some little girls were boasting of their respective families. They had passed from clothes to personal appearance and finally came to parental dignity. The minister's little girl boasted:
"Every package that comes to my papa is marked 'D. D.' " "And every package that comes for my papa is marked 'M. D.' " retorted the daughter of the village physician. Then followed a look of contempt from the youngest of the party. "Huh," she exclaimed,
"Every package that comes to our house has three letters on it: 'C. O. D.' "

A bashful young couple who were very much in love entered a crowded car.

"Do you suppose we can squeeze in here?" he asked looking doubtfully at her blushing face. "Don't you think, dear, we had better wait until we get home?" was the low, embarrassed answer.

A hardware merchant, Flake Keyes, of Holia, Okla., was rejoicing over the news that the stork had just visited his home, and he asked: "Is it a girl?" and the answer was, "no, it's girls, 1, 2, 3, 4, of them." His look of joy faded away for a moment but finally it dawned upon him that his wife had just given birth to four healthy daughters weighing six pounds each. Then his smile came back. Mrs. Keyes is 34 years old.
Already the couple were parents of two girls and two boys. Here's hoping these new Keyes will unlock the door of happiness to the whole family.

The kindly old "Squire of the neighborhood" was just leaving from a friendly social visit to Mrs. Maguire. "And your son, Mrs. Maguire?" said the "Squire" as he reached for his hat. "I hope he is well. Busy, I suppose, getting ready for his wedding to-night?"
"Well, not very busy this morning," "Squire," answered the beaming mother. "He's upstairs in bed while I'm washing out his trousseau."

A family on the north side of Boyne City have several children but only one, the eldest is a boy. The little lad grew used to sisters and longed for a brother.
The boy was 12 summers recently and the house was rather upset in anticipation of something or other. The father was busy and the son had to sift the ashes and take care of the furnace. At this juncture a nurse appeared on the scene and two days later she came to the little boy. "What do you think you've got?"
she asked him. "A baby brother," fairly gasped the youngster. "No," dearie, it's a baby sister," replied the nurse. "Gosh," groaned the youngster,
"must I always sift these ashes?"

AMONG THE PLAYERS And Caddies

The caddies are reminded of their annual tournament, and the fact that it is never won by the fellow who does not practice. The Golf Club willingly allows the caddies the use of the course, during the hours designated, as long as they do not misuse it. The boy who appreciates this privilege will not mistreat the course in any way, or allow anyone else to do so.

Our friend Thomas Howard, being built more for comfort than for speed, never struck twelve as Professionals' Caddie.
At noon on the second day
Tom resigned in favor of anybody that wanted the job. James Pumpfrey, took the dare and, with the exception of an afternoon or two, stayed with the work therest of the week. The Professionals' caddie this week is Ed Krulik, number 10.

So far, complaints against caddies on the part of players have been "conspicuous by their absence." Only five have been entered up to date. Somebody is evidently thinking about that excursion in August. Plans for the excursion, by the way, are being formulated now, the date will be announced in a week or two.

The talk about the present season running lighter than that of 1914 has not much truth in it, if the records mean anything. The work was simply a bit slow in starting. Monday of this week was the season's busiest day, with 155 starters. On this day something over $75.00 was distributed among the caddies.

The number of new boys who have shown up for enrollment this season is very pleasing. They are for the most part well-appearing, and willing lads.
We hope they will continue to work at the links and study to become good caddies.

The new rule cards will be out this week. Every caddie will be a much better caddie if he learns what is printed on the card, and works accordingly.
The cards may be had for the asking.

The game lost a good caddie last week when Percy Durance went to work in Fowler's Market. Dick Finucan has been given number four.

There have 106 boys registered on the Caddie Master's book. This is enough to take care of the work, if every boy will come to work.

GROWING SWEET CLOVER IN WESTERN MICHIGAN

loams, sandy loams, gravelly and stony soils, and has even been found growing on sawdust and cinders. It makes good growth in soils too wet and soils too dry for red clover or alfalfa. It will grow even, on acid soils, but will of course produce better yields in soils that are not acid. It will grow on very poor and very rough ground and will do well where other clovers will not even make a start. It develops the largest root growth of any of the legumes, which enables it to obtain moisture in times of severe drouth, therefore, it will do well on one-half the rainfall necessary for other clovers. It does not winter kill or lift out by freezing, and is known to exist in most every country of the civilized world. Because of its ability to survive under such severe conditions it is a very sure crop and far ahead of alfalfa in this respect; for alfalfa is not adapted to rotation purposes, once a field is seeded to alfalfa it should remain seven or eight years, for alfalfa is not at its best until the third or fourth year. I would, therefore, say that if you have had any difficulty in getting a stand of alfalfa or other clovers that you try sweet clover.

There are many many farms in such conditions that clovers cannot be raised on them, for the reason that the soil robbing method of growing grain crops continuously has been practiced so long that nitrogen and humus have given out.
Not only does nitrogen leave the soil by grain cropping but it escapes from the soil like gas and also leaches out. It is the first element to leave the soil and the first that the farmer has to replace, and the only plants that put nitrogen into the soil are those of the legume family. So instead of paying 18 or 20 cents per lb. for commercial nitrogen, every farmer should be gathering it free from the air, for there are thousands of dollars worth of it lying over every acre of land. He is replacing nitrogen the expensive way when drawing it from the railroad station; but by a cheap method when he raises sweet clover.
For this plant gathers more nitrogen from the air than any other legume, and adds more humus to the soil because of its fleshy roots which decay the second year, and become a part of the soil quickly. Making a mellow sod to break up which is quite an advantage over alfalfa.

The man who already has his farm in shape to raise alfalfa may not be interested in sweet clover but the man who has robbed his soil, and for the thousands of farms now abandoned, turned out to the commons, and gone back to the state for taxes, sweet clover is the redemption. Did you ever know of a man abandoning an improved farm or offering it for sale for half the cost of the improvements if he could raise two or three tons of clover per acre?

We have laws passed for the protection of the timber and game in the state, but both were nearly gone before these laws were thought of—would it not be well to protect the soil from robbery before it is too late? For when we rob the soil we rob future generations of their birthright.

Gentlemen: Just consider for one moment that the soil is the work shop of life, and to it all the plant and animal life upon the earth owe their existence, and when we wake up to the fact that all life depends on the food giving capacity of the soil we will be less liable to abuse the soil.

Probably no plant has been more talked, written and read about than alfalfa. It is good and all that is claimed for it. But while called the King of the clovers, and considered a general purpose plant, it has a strong rival in SWEET CLOVER, which I consider is more fairly entitled to the honor of king.

Now let us quickly compare the two without prejudice.

Sweet clover will grow where alfalfa will not.
Sweet clover is the stronger growing plant. Scientific analysis of the two plants has been made by good authority such as Mr. Westgate, of the Department of Agriculture, of Washington, D. C., and results show that the two plants are practically equal in protein
lb. for pound.

For pasture sweet clover has alfalfa cheated, for it is the first to appear in the spring, and the last to be killed by frosts in the fall. It crowns two inches under the ground, so close pasturing does not hurt it, which is not true of alfalfa; and it will furnish more pasture during dry weather.

It is not as liable to block stock as alfalfa.

Sweet clover is a sure and prolific seed producer, yielding twice as much seed per acre as alfalfa. And at present prices it is not surprising that some dealers have been adulterating sweet clover with alfalfa seed and also putting the yellow blooming variety on the inexperienced buyers.

Sweet clover is not troubled with insects, leaf blight or other diseases as alfalfa sometimes is.

To speak of sweet clover as a weed would cause no sensation and the reason it has so long been classed as such, is on account of its vigorous growth, its defiance of drouth, its ability to stand severe winters and to thrive where no

THEATRICAL

"HYPOCRITES," a photoplay written and directed by Lois Weber and released by Bosworth, Inc., is one of the most striking and unusual pictures now on the market. It is strongly dramatic, but has interwoven with its main theme a remarkable vein of allegory and fantasy, which is bound to make it one of the most talked of pictures put before the public. It deals frankly with the sin of hypocrisy, and the fear that possesses many people when brought face to face with Truth. For a theme so striking, only a cast of exceptional skill and spirit could be used, and Miss Weber was fortunate in securing the services of such artists as Courtney Foote, Myrtle Stedman, Herbert Standing, Adele Farrington, Dixie Carr and Margaret Edwards, whose work as Truth is worthy of special mention.
"HYPOCRITES" is remarkable also for the beauty and artistry of the production. The photography is superlatively fine, the camera men, Del Clawson and Geo. W. Hill, securing a number of absolutely new effects. One scene uses twelve exposures on one piece of film passing through the camera 24 times. At the Majestic July 19.

ANNUAL SCHOOL MEETING

A. F. Bridge and Frank M. Glassford Selected for Trustees.

Nothing very startling occurred at the annual school meeting held Monday evening. The crowd present was of about the average size and the usual good speakers voiced their opinions concerning the affairs of the school.

After the reading and adoption of the reports of the treasurer and secretary, the annual election of two trustees took place. A. F. Bridge was the choice of the meeting to succeed R. W. Kane, and Frank M. Glassford was elected to succeed himself. Nominations were numerous, but the election went through like any well oiled political convention.

The proposition to include manual training and domestic science met with little favor from those present, although not over ten per cent of the tax payers of the district were present.

Financially, the school district is in better shape today than in years. The members of the board have done their work faithfully and considerable credit is due them.

FIRING A TORPEDO.

How a Submarine Flings Forth the Deadly Projectile.

When a submarine sights a hostile vessel a group of sailors quickly cluster around the torpedo tube. This is loaded with its instrument of destruction, and behind it a powder charge is inserted as a receptacle and the trigger controlling the firing mechanism cocked ready.

A gunner proceeds to estimate the speed of the target and its course through glasses. He then adjusts a device known as the "director," which by means of dials tells him when the tube is pointing in the right direction to launch the torpedo true to its mark. At a distance of about 3,000 yards the gunner presses a button, the powder charge explodes and a pressure of fifty pounds per square inch is put upon the rear end of the torpedo.

The well greased projectile is forced through the open end of the tube at a rate of thirty-five feet per second, and as it takes the water in a long dive the twin propellers in the rear set to work. They are driven by an air pressure of 2,250 pounds, which sets the driving machinery in motion as the torpedo leaps from its tube.

A gyroscopic steering gear prevents the torpedo from deviating from a straight path, and unless it is careless it will find its target quickly maneuvering out of the way the 500 projectile seldom misses its mark.—London Answers.

STUCK IN THE MUD.

That Was the Normal Condition in Chicago Village in 1833.

An elaborate series of descriptions of middle western road conditions is contained in Charles Cleaver's "History of Chicago From 1832 to 1892, Illustrating the Difficulties of the Route From New York to Chicago." In the village of Chicago in 1833, Cleaver tells us:

"Fretful informed us that in the spring we would find it almost impossible to get around for the mud, a truth forcibly illustrated when a few months later I got into a wagon to go about one and a half miles northwest. It was with the greatest difficulty that two good horses could pull the empty wagon through the two feet of mud and water across the prairie. . . . A year or two later I saw many teams stuck fast in the streets of the village."

"I remember once on a stagecoach got mired in Clark street opposite the Sherman House, where it remained several days, with a board driven into the mud bearing this inscription, 'No bottom here.' I once saw a lady stuck in the mud in the middle of Randolph street. She was evidently in need of help, as every time she moved she sank deeper and deeper. An old gentleman from the country offered to help her, which had such an effect upon her modesty that with one desperate effort she drew her feet out minus her shoes."

Why You Sneez.

There is more than one cause for sneezing, and persons may differ in their susceptibility to them. A bright light will cause some persons to sneeze, the pollen of certain plants will affect others, and most people are likely to sneeze in the presence of dust. Such sneezing is due to superficial irritation.

The sneeze caused by the effect of cold is different. It is an attempt of nature to cure you. She makes you sneeze for the same reason that she makes you shiver—to generate heat for warming the blood and preventing you from taking more cold—to help relieve the cold you have.

The sneezing from cold is not an act of the nose alone, this being merely the part of the body where it explodes. It is an act of the entire body during which every muscle gives a jump. The body is infected by a spasmodic effort to warm the entire system and throw off the cold.—Boston Herald.

Destiny.

Destiny is either the excuse men give for their errors or a humble supplement to their successes. Destiny reconciles a man to unhappiness, the abuse of the proletariat, ingratitude and relatives, especially if they are his own.

A man who is making progress is thought by himself to control his own destiny. When he isn't making progress his destiny controls him.

Destiny is always at work. When it is not doing it is undoing. It has a star for a trademark which is recognized in every country in the world. It has made a great many see double.

Submarine mines.

Wet gunnison in submarine mines is, of course, a very potent explosive, but in many respects it is quite outclassed by the compound used in German mines and known as trinitrotoluene, but abbreviated to "T. N. T." In Great Britain and to "trout" in Germany. A shell, torpedo or mine loaded with "T. N. T." (which requires to be detonated by means of mercury fulminate) bursts with great violence into large fragments, whereas if loaded with picric acid the splinters are very small and cannot therefore do as much damage. Although wet gunnison is more powerful if exploded in close proximity to the target, the effect of "T. N. T." is much greater when the explosion takes place some distance away.—London Telegraph.

The Steamer Duck.

Around the southern extremity of South America is to be found a very large duck, which bears the common name of "steamer duck" or "race horse," owing to a peculiar habit it has of rowing itself along the surface of the water at great speed. This is said to be due to the remarkable fact that the bird loses its power of flight when it reaches maturity. These ducks are very common.—Chicago Herald.

Too Horrible to Contemplate.

"No, Mr. Upp," Phyllis said, with a sigh, "I cannot marry you. I confess that I have much more than a friendly feeling for you, but suppose we were to marry and you should die and leave me in straitened circumstances and I should take in boarders and they should make a pun of my name as landlady, calling me Phyllis Upp?"—London Stray Stories.

Ate With Fingers.

The Greeks and Romans, with all their luxury, ate with their fingers. They had large forks for dealing with hay and for taking meat from kettles, but they never thought of having small ones for table use.

screened by a clump of trees, saw and heard her first "home rule" meeting. When Frank O'Connell first spoke his voice thrilled her. Gradually the excitement of the people under the mastery of his power communicated itself to her. It pulsed in her blood and throbbed in her brain. For the first time she realized what a marvelous force was the call of the patriot. To listen and watch a man risking life and liberty in the cause of his country—her heart and her mind and her soul went out to him.

When the soldiers marched on to the scene she was paralyzed with fear. When an order to fire was given she wanted to ride into their midst and cry out to them to stop. But she was unable to move hand or foot.

When the smoke had thinned and she saw lying motionless on the ground the bodies of men who a moment before had been full of life and strength; when was added to that the horror of the wounded crying out with pain, her first impulse was to fly from the sight of the carnage. She mastered that moment of fear and plunged forward, calling to the groom to follow her. She ordered the body of O'Connell, who had been hit, taken to her own home.

The long, slow, tortuous journey home, the men slowly following with the ghastly, mute body on the rude litter, became a living memory to her for all the remainder of her life.

She glanced down every little while at the stone white face and shuddered as she found herself wondering if she would ever hear his voice again or see those great blue eyes flash with his fierce courage and devotion.

As they neared her brother's house stragglers began to follow curiously. Sad looking men and weary women joined the procession wondering. All guessed it was some fresh outrage of the soldiers.

It seemed to Angela that an infinity of time had passed before they entered the grounds attached to the Kingsnorth house. She sent a man on ahead to order a room to be prepared and a doctor sent for. As she saw her brother coming forward to meet her with knitted brows and stern eyes she turned herself to greet him.

"What is this, Angela?" he asked, looking in amazement at the strange procession.

"Another martyr to our ignorant government, Nathaniel," said she pressed on through the drive to the house.

CHAPTER II.

Angela Speaks Freely.

NATHANIEL'S indignation at his sister's conduct was beyond bounds when he learned who the wounded man was. He ordered the soldiers to take the man and themselves away. The magistrate intervened and begged him at least to let O'Connell rest there until a doctor could patch him up. He might be dangerous to take him back without medical treatment. He assured Nathaniel that the moment they would move him he would be lodged in the county jail. Nathaniel went back to his study as the sorry procession passed on to the front door. He sent immediately for his sister. The reply came, back that she would see him at dinner. He commanded her to come to him at once.

In a few minutes Angela came into the room. She was deathly pale. Her voice trembled as she spoke:

"What do you want?"

"Because he is wounded."

"Such accidents are better dead."

"I don't think so. Nor do I think him a coward."

"He came here to attack landlords—to attack me! And you bring him to my house and with that rabbit! It's outrageous! Monstrous!"

"I couldn't leave him with those heartless wretches to die in their hands."

"He leaves here the moment a doctor has attended him."

"Very well. Is that all?"

"No, it isn't! Kingsnorth tried to control his anger. After a pause he continued: 'I want no more of these foolishly, quite useless of yours. I've heard of your visiting these wretched people—going into fever dens. Is that conduct becoming to your name? Think a little of your status in life and what it demands.'"

"I wish you did a little more."

"What?" he shouted, all his anger returned.

"There's no need to raise your voice," Angela answered quietly. "I am only a few feet away. I repeat that I wish you thought a little more of your obligations. If you did and others like you in the same position you are in, there would be no such horrible scenes as I saw today—a man shot down among his own people for speaking the truth."

"You saw it?" Nathaniel asked in dismay.

"I did. I not only saw, but I heard I wish you had too. I heard a man lay bare his heart and his brain and his soul that others might know the light in them. I saw and heard a man offer up his life that others might know some gleam of happiness in their lives. It was wonderful! It was heroic! It was godlike!"

"If I ever hear of your doing such a thing again you shall go back to London the next day."

"That sounds exactly as though" my dead father were speaking."

"I'll not be made a laughingstock by you."

"You make yourself out as your father did before you—a Kingsnorth!"

Angela Had Seen Suffering No One Dreamed Of.

What has your name meant? Because one of our forefathers cheated the world into giving him a fortune by buying his goods for more than they were worth we have tried to canonize him and put a halo round the name of Kingsnorth. To me it stands for all that is mean and selfish and vain and ignorant—the power of money over intellect. How did we become owners of this miserable piece of land? A Kingsnorth swindled his rightful owner—lent him money on usury, bought up his bills and his mortgages and when he couldn't pay foreclosed on him. No wonder there's a curse on the village and on us!"

Kingsnorth tried to speak, but she stopped him:

"Wait a moment. It was a good stroke of business taking this estate away. Oh, yes, it was a good stroke of business! Our name has been built up on 'good strokes of business.' Well, I tell you it's a bad stroke of business when human lives are put into the hands of such creatures as we Kingsnorths have proved ourselves!"

"Stop!" cried Nathaniel, outraged to the innermost sanctuary of his being. "Stop! You don't speak like one of our family. It is like listening to some heretic—some!"

"I don't feel like one of your family. You are a Kingsnorth. I am my mother's child—my poor, gentle, patient mother, who lived a life of unselfish resignation, who welcomed death when it came to her as a release from tyranny. Don't call me a Kingsnorth! I know the family too well. I know all the name means to the people who have suffered through your family."

"After this—the best thing—the only thing—is to separate," said Nathaniel.

"Whenever you wish."

"Don't let it be a burden."

"I've never been so shocked—so stunned!"

"I am glad. From my cradle I've been shocked and stunned—in my home. It's some compensation to know you are capable of the feeling too. Frankly, I didn't think you were."

"We'll talk no more of this," and Nathaniel began to pace the room.

"I am finished," and Angela went to the door.

"It would be better we didn't meet again—in any event, not often," added Nathaniel.

"Thank you," said Angela, opening the door. He motioned her to close it, that he had something more to say.

"We'll find you some suitable chaparral. You can spend your winters abroad, as you have been doing—London for the season—until you're suitably married. I'll follow out my father's wishes to the letter. You shall be handsomely provided for the day you marry."

She closed the door with a snap and came back to him and looked him steadily in the eyes.

"The man I marry shall take nothing from you. Even in his 'last will and testament' my father proved himself a Kingsnorth. It was only a Kingsnorth could make his youngest daughter dependent on you!"

"My father knew I would respect his wishes."

"He was equally responsible for me, yet he leaves me to your care—a Kingsnorth! The men masters and the women slaves! That is the Kingsnorth doctrine."

A servant came in to tell Angela the doctor had come. Without a word Angela went out to see to the wounded man. The servant followed her.

Let alone, Nathaniel sat down, shocked and stunned. He reviewed the interview he had just had with his young sister.

When Angela entered the sickroom she found Dr. McGlun, a cheery, bright-eyed, round little man of fifty, talking freely to the patient and pouncing each speech with a hearty laugh. His good humor was infectious.

The wounded knight felt the effect of it and was trying to laugh feebly himself.

"Sure it's the fine target ye must have made with yer six feet and one inch. How could this poor soldier help blitherin' ye? Answer me that!" And the jovial doctor laughed again as he dexterously wound a bandage around O'Connell's arm.

"Aisy now while I tie the bandage, me fine fellow. Ye'll live to see the inside of an English jail yet."

He turned as he heard the door open and greeted Angela.

"Good afternoon to ye, Miss Kingsnorth. Faith, it's a blessing 'ya brought the boy here. There's no tellin' what the prison surgeon would have done to him. It is salt-peter, they tell me. The English doctors rub into the Irish wounds to keep them smartin'. And, by the like token, they do the same, too, in the English house of commons. Salt-peter in Ireland's wounds is what they give us."

"Is he much hurt?" asked Angela.

"Well, they've broken nothin'. Just blackened his face and made a few holes in his skin. It's blackest they used 'thickshot'. Thank the merciful Mr. Foster for that same. 'Thickshot Foster,' as the Irish reverently call him."

"What a dastardly thing to do!" she cried.

"Ye may well say that, Miss Kingsnorth. But the merry little doctor, 'But it's better than a bullet from a Martin-Henry rifle, that's what it is. And there's many a poor English landlord's got one of 'em in the back for ridin' about at night on his own land. It's a fatherly government we have, Miss Kingsnorth. 'Hurt 'em, but don't kill 'em,' sez they, 'and then put 'em in jail and feed them on bread and water. That'll take the bile out of 'em and paralyze 'em out of 'em,' sez they."

"They'll never take it out of me. They may kill me perhaps, but they don't they'll never silence me," murmured O'Connell in a voice so low, yet so bitter, that it startled Angela.

"Ye'll do that all in good time, me fine boy," said the busy little doctor. "Here, take a pill at this," and he handed the patient a glass in which he had dropped a few crystals into some water.

Dr. McGlun said in a whisper to Angela:

"Let him have that every three hours; often if he wants to talk. We've got to get his mind at rest."

"There's no danger!" asked Angela in the same tone.

"No, in the world. He's got a fine constitution, and mebbe the buck shot was pretty clean. I've washed them out well."

"To think of men shot down like dogs for speaking of their country. It's horrible! It's wicked! It's monstrous!"

"Faith, the English don't know what else to do with them, miss. It's no use arguin' with the like of him. That man lyin' on that bed 'ud talk the blind foot off a haffer. The only way to keep the likes of him quiet is to shoot him, and begosh they have."

"I heard you, doctor," came from the bed. "If they'd killed me today there would be a thousand voices rise all over Ireland to take the place of mine."

"Faith, I'd rather keep me own life than to have a hundred thousand speakin' for me and me dead. Is it long yer stayin' here?" and the little man poked up his hat.

"I don't know," said Angela.

"Well, it's you they'll miss when ye're gone, Miss Kingsnorth. Faith, if all the English were like you this sort of thing couldn't happen."

"We don't try to understand the people, doctor. We just govern them blindly and ignorantly."

"Faith, it's small blame to the English. We're a mighty hard race to make head or tail of, and that's a fact—crisp salt tears at the bedside of a sick child and layin' to shoot a poor man in the ribs for darlin' to ask for his rent."

"They're not Irishmen," came from the sickbed.

"Faith, and they are, now. And it's small wonder the men who sit in Whitehall in London treat them like savages."

"I've seen things since I've been here that would justify almost any thing!" cried Angela. "I've seen suffering no one in England dreamed of; misery that London, with all its poverty and wretchedness, could not compare with. Were I born in Ireland I should be proud to stake my liberty and my life to protect my own people from such horrible brutality."

The wounded man opened his eyes and looked full at Angela. It was a look at once of gratitude and reverence and admiration.

Her heart leaped within her.

DAIRY and CREAMERY

HEAD OF THE DAIRY HERD.

Use of a Pure Bred Bull Best Method of Increasing Milk Production.

If you are a dairy farmer you belong to one of three classes—one who raises a pure bred herd, a grade herd or a scrub herd. Charles A. Danks in Orange Judd Farmer. When considering the latter class it is obvious that scrub cows, if they pay enough to make business profits, must cost at least $50. If you also have a scrub bull the chances are that the heifers from your cows will not be as profitable as their dams, thus resulting in a loss.

There is only one remedy—a pure bred dairy bull. If he costs as much as these bulls you think you cannot afford.

Cleanliness is of the utmost importance in the production of good milk. In the up to date dairies the milkers are always spick and span. Quarters are provided for bathing and washing, and clean white duck suits are worn. The udders and hind quarters are wiped with a damp cloth before milking is begun in order that particles of dirt and loose hairs do not fall into the milk pail. When milk is clean at the start it keeps better and the cream brings a higher price. The picture shows a modern milkman.

ford it. The production is decreasing. If your cows must be bought the costs are higher each year. Why not produce from your scrub animals that will command in some cases twice the price of their scrub dams? To prove this one need only go to some farmer and try to buy his grade heifers that are of only one pure bred cross. If a few grades are tested it will be seen they beat the scrubs at the pail. This will convince you that the best method is to buy a pure bred bull and improve the grade.

A registered bull, the breeding and record of whose ancestors can be told by reading his pedigree, will surely improve the production of the herd and maintain a steady upward gradation year after year. A man never goes back to a grade bull who has once used a pure bred.

It is a hard problem to get a good pure bred bull, as he must be one that all acknowledge is not only superior to the cows, but is the best obtainable in the market and whose blood is desired by breeders. To get one requires study and searching.

FIRE EATERS.

The Trick of Breathing Flames and Sparks From the Mouth.

The first known fire breather was a Syrian slave named Ennis, a leader in the service war in Sicily, 130 B. C. He pretended to have immediate communication with the gods. When desirous of inspiring his followers with courage he breathed flames and sparks from his mouth.

In order to accomplish this feat Ennis pierced a nutshell at both ends and, having filled it with some burning substance, he put it in his mouth and breathed through it. The same trick is performed today in a more improved manner. The performer rolls some flax or hemp into a ball about the size of a walnut, which he lets burn until it is nearly consumed. Then he rolls around it more flax while it is still burning. By this means the fire is retained in the ball for a long time. He slips this ball into his mouth, uncoiled and breathes through it. His breath revives the fire, and he sustains no injury so long as he breathes only through his nostrils.

Various theories have been advanced to account for other feats of this sort performed by the ancients. An old ordeal was the holding of a red-hot iron by the accused, who was not burned if he were innocent. Probably some protective paste was used on the hands. The peculiar property of mineral salts, such as alum, to protect articles of dress from fire has long been known. An old Milanese devised a costume consisting of a cloth covering for the body which had been steeped in alum. A metallic dress of wire gauze was added to this, and thus protected a man might walk on hot iron.

TRAINING FOR LONGEVITY.

The Mental Attitude is as Important as Bodily Vigor.

A few years ago a young man "died of old age" in a New York hospital. After an autopsy the surgeons said that while the youth was in reality only twenty-three years old he was internally eighty.

It is the aged mind that frequently makes the body old. "Keep growing or die" is nature's motto, a motto written all over everything in the universe. There must be a constant activity in the mind that would not age, and the body is but the expression of the mind.

There is no doubt that as a race we shorten our lives very materially through our false thinking, our bad living and our old age convictions. Dr. Metchnikoff of the Pasteur Institute in Paris says that men should live at least 120 years. Yet it is only in rare instances today that a man reaches even the century mark.

Making a business of prolonging life and still retaining as much as possible of its vigor, freshness and buoyancy ought to be a prime object, especially after one has passed fifty. While proper care of the body is absolutely essential for the attainment of this object, the mental influence far transcends all others. The attitude of the mind has everything to do with hastening or retarding the degenerative processes incident to one's declining years. It is an established fact that the body follows the thought, is shaped by the mental convictions, emotions, moods.—Orison Swett Marden in Nautilus.

TEMPERANCE NOTES

(Conducted by the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union.)

WE WELCOME YOU!
"A Greeting to Newcomers From Other Lands."

(This greeting, in seven different languages and illustrated with the American flag in colors, is given to immigrants landing at our different ports of entry.)

We welcome you to our great Republic! We welcome you to its free public schools; its free libraries and reading rooms; to the free picture galleries and pleasant parks of our great cities; to the vast grain fields and rich farming lands of the Golden West; to your new home—east, west, north or south! While you will always love the beautiful flag of your own land, we hope you will also love our red, white and blue flag with its forty-eight shining stars for the forty-eight states of this big Republic, which stretches from the Atlantic to the Pacific Ocean. This flag floats over free public schools, which are attended by thousands of boys and girls, who have come to us from other lands.

Perhaps you left your steamer feeling sad and lonely because you were a stranger in a strange land. If so, we hope it will comfort you to know and realize that every member of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, a society organized in ten thousand cities, towns and villages of America, is your sincere friend. We hope some kind woman wearing the little white ribbon bow, the badge of our organization, was the first to greet you as you stepped upon our shores. We wish we might take from your heart all its homesick feeling. We hope you will soon find a pleasant home in our country. Among our members there are many women from other lands and we cordially invite you to join us, and to help us increase the prosperity of our country, and make it a safer and happier nation. We should love to have the boys and girls unite with our temperance society for the children, called the Loyal Temperance Legion.

If you reached the United States through the port of New York, you rejoiced to see, as you entered the harbor, the Goddess of Liberty—the majestic figure of a woman holding aloft a flaming torch to enlighten the world. Yes, this is the land of true personal liberty; for each individual has the liberty to make the most of himself or herself and to become a useful, educated, upright man or woman. Some of the most prominent positions in business and government are filled by the children of parents who were born in other lands. They are the governing power in many of our large cities, and in some of our states. Thousands of Norwegians, Swedes, Germans, Italians, and men and women of other nationalities, now Americans, are enthusiastically aiding in our temperance work. When you have become an American citizen, we hope you will vote against the saloon and against the manufacture and sale of all alcoholic liquors. In many states, women as well as men, are citizens and can vote.

The headquarters of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union are at Evanston, Illinois, but wherever you may make your home you will receive from those who wear the little white ribbon bow, a warm and true welcome.

A DRAWING CAMPAIGN.

A small girl went home from school at Ketchikan, Alaska, after a talk to the children by Mrs. Cornelia Templeton Hatcher, president of the territorial W. C. T. U., and excitedly announced to her mother that she was "going to sign the mustard roll." Mrs. Hatcher repeated the information to her audience that night and told them that the temperance forces intended to put considerable ginger into the campaign for prohibition and the children would supply a "right smart of mustard." The combination would make a plaster that would draw every dry voter to the polls on November 4, 1915.

WHOSE BOYS?

Recent investigations show that two-thirds of all the drunkards contract the drinking habit before they are twenty-one years old, nearly one-third before they are sixteen, and about seven per cent before they are twelve. The liquor dealers know this, and for business reasons they must "create appetite" among schoolboys. One family out of every five must furnish a recruit for the army of drunkards or the "trade" must go under, and one wonders if the men who vote for saloons are willing to furnish their boys to help support them!

HELPS THE UNDERTAKER.

"If any man here," shouted the temperance speaker, "can name an honest business that has been helped by the saloon, I will spend the rest of my life working for the liquor people."

A man in the audience arose, "I consider my business an honest one," he said, "and it has undoubtedly been helped by the saloon."

"What is your business?" yelled the orator.

"I, sir," responded the man, "am an undertaker."

BEAUTIFUL EYES

A Case of Mistaken Identity.

By C. S. THOMPSON

Copyright by Frank A. Munsey Co.

"Say, Mr. Van Norden, pardon my saying it, but you've done a fine trick. Why, say, that girl's a well known crook."

Murdock went on staring at him, at first with a plying smile; then he threw down on the desk a police photograph, with a card which read:

Martha Benjamin, swindler, aged twenty-four, height five feet four inches, of American parentage, large brown eyes, very fine teeth, never more than plainly dressed. Her name usually played in the financial district.

"The eyes," said young Van Norden nervously. "I can see a difference in the eyes."

"Let me see; you say she went down by the back elevators?"

"I simply said she went out by this side hall door."

Young Van Norden went as far as the front office and stood a moment, with a sense of unrest, listening to the staccato writing of a market ticker. He then returned, lit another cigarette, and after he had smoked awhile he went to the inner room.

"I beg your pardon, Miss Summerton," he said. "I didn't mean to be quite so loud."

He found himself gazing into her eyes again—eyes of wondrous beauty.

"Mr. Van Norden," she said, without spirit, "I couldn't help but hear just now. The transom was wide open."

"Yes, I wanted you to hear," he said, frowning.

"Mr. Van Norden," she said, "I couldn't bring myself to tell you before. But there seems to be no help for it. My name isn't Summerton. I'm Mr. Wentworth's daughter."

He stood staring at her suddenly, with hardness in his eyes; then after a while he gave himself up to a sense of relief.

"My dear girl," he said, "I can hardly believe that any one of Mr. Wentworth's family should come to us. The last we heard of him, some fifteen years ago, he accused my father of being a crook, a thief."

He came to a sudden stop.

"Just a moment, if you please," he went on, going to the front office.

"Tommy," said he to the boy at the door, "have Mr. Murdock come right up, and don't wait to knock."

He turned to the girl.

"Perhaps you aren't familiar with the details of their quarrel?" he said, seating himself again. "The trouble was over a will. Mr. Wentworth said he gave orders to sell. My father said not. Later on it developed Mr. Wentworth was in the right. The mistake was due to the reading of a telegram. My father immediately drew his check for the full amount, but the check came back. Mr. Wentworth said he wouldn't be an object of charity."

"Yes, I know," she quickly answered. "But I thought if you were only half human, in a time like this—"

"My dear girl," he said, playing with his unlit cigarette, "when Mr. Wentworth returned my father's check, some fifteen years ago, this money was then put to his credit, and that amount, together with the interest at 6 per cent up to date, now makes in all, I believe, some $40,000."

"My father never spoke of this. Mr. Van Norden," she remarked, "you believe me, don't you, when I tell you I'm Mr. Wentworth's daughter?"

He found her eyes glistening with feeling, and yet he purposely hid his feeling.

"I see you still have your doubts," she said.

"There's only one thing I want to clear up," he answered uneasily. "Can't you wait—just a moment?"

He returned to the window, awaiting his man, and presently the office boy ushered him in without knocking.

Murdock looked first at the girl, then at young Van Norden, with a puzzled air.

"Beg your pardon, Mr. Van Norden," he began.

"No, it's all right," answered young Van Norden. "I want you to meet this young woman, whom you've been following here for two days."

Young Van Norden turned to her.

"Miss Summerton," he said to her, "Mr. Murdock is from the detective bureau at police headquarters. He has a photograph—a rather good likeness—I want him to show you."

Murdock slowly took out his police picture, handing it to the girl, at the same time regarding her with keen eyes.

"Mr. Murdock," said young Van Norden, speaking to him, "I called you in because, it may be, you'll be running into her more or less from now on. Miss Summerton has an account with us."

Young Van Norden then turned to the girl, who had made her examination of the photograph.

"Miss Summerton," he said, "Mr. Murdock is detailed in Wall street to secure off any crooks who may show a desire to operate below what he calls the dead line."

Murdock took the picture from the girl, saying: "You look something like her, don't you think? But you ain't as tall, and, as your friend here was saying, Miss Summerton, there's real beauty in your eyes."

"A clear case of mistaken identity," said the detective in the front office.

Young Van Norden smiled to himself and immediately returned to the girl.

"Mr. Van Norden," she began, now almost at the point of tears, "you believe me now?"

"My dear little girl," he said, unable to control his feeling any longer, "yes, indeed, I believe you. But that isn't the point. Half an hour ago I gave you a check, which, I believe, you accepted. It's yours by right. Come, hadn't you better see what it says?"

She took out her check, unfolding it, and read: "Pay to the order of Mary Wentworth $40,000."

Mrs. Cowen took charge of the program. The union singing "We All Belong." Following this came the report of the convention recently held at Sault Ste Marie, by Mrs. Alcox, which was listened to with marked interest. This report was exceptionally fine and a rising vote of thanks was given Mrs. Alcox, who in turn thanked the union for making it possible for her to attend the convention. Some of the experiences of Mrs. Alcox, aside from the convention, were interesting. Before returning she visited the "Canadian Soo" and while there saw some of the men who were preparing to go to the front, in the service of His Majesty, the King of England, to help fill up the ranks of the allies. The seeing of these troops made the war seem so much more real to her.

The song "Keep On Praying," by Esther Powell, was listened to with interest. Mrs. Burdick related some of her experiences in California, her visit to the exposition, and the display of the W. C. T. U. there, and of seeing the Polyglot Petition. The story of this mammoth world's petition is an interesting one.

Mrs. Usher, the hostess, served home made candy, which was delicious.

THREE NUMBERS OF CHAUTAUQUA

To be Held in Charlevoix Week of July 27 to August 1st.

A Week of Wholesome Entertainment—Numbers of Special Interest.

The Lincoln Chautauqua will open its week's program here Tuesday, July 27, with the Conservatory Players. A good program has been arranged for each day and should receive the hearty support of all Charlevoix residents and summer visitors.

Mason's Jubilee Singers, a company of exceptionally able colored folks who have devoted themselves exclusively to the negro plantation scenes and traditions. These people can sing many celebrated selections and much classical music but they do not indulge such tendencies on the chautauqua platform. They believe that the peculiar charm of the quaint and plaintive southern melodies is not only indescribable but imperishable.

They appear both afternoon and evening on the Chautauqua program of the second day.

J. K. Coddling, ex-warden of the prison at Leavenworth, Kansas, is scheduled to appear on the program of the Lincoln Chautauqua System in the afternoon and evening of the sixth day.

This is the man who became a national character a few years ago because he discussed a number of the causes of criminality and their cures. While warden of the penitentiary he removed the stripes from all reasonable men, and along with the stripes went nearly all of the onerous humiliating conditions usually imposed upon prisoners. The men responded to his treatment in such a manner as to convince prison authorities everywhere that criminals are usually victims of circumstances, and they need but fair and humane treatment on the part of their advisers to come back to real manhood. But Warden Coddling begins with the boy; that is the secret of his grip upon the masses of people.

On the third day of the Chautauqua Pitt Parker will appear in crayon recital and cartoon lecture. He is considered one of the best humorists of the day and no doubt will appeal to the humor loving citizens of Charlevoix.

Purchased A Binder.

Sam Straw of Marlon purchased a new eight foot binder of J. R. Cooper last week. W. E. Byers set the machine up Tuesday and it is now ready for use. The binder has many new features for the convenience of the operator. One main feature of the machine is the new tongue truck which relieves the weight of the binder from the horses. The eight foot knife is a new novelty in this part of the state and will no doubt create considerable interest among the local farmers. It requires four horses to conveniently operate the machine.

Black Leg or Black Quarter of Young Cattle

Several Cases of This Acute and Infectious Disease Discovered in the County.

Several complaints have recently been made among farmers and stockmen regarding a mysterious disease which has attacked their animals, several of which have died or are at the present time in the last stages of the disease. Upon inquiry, we have found several instances where cattle have died from this disease, and no one seemed to be able to tell what the trouble was. The Courier took the matter up with Dr. A. F. McGreevy, who says the disease is "Black-leg." Below is reproduced what he has to say about the disease and its cure:

Black-leg or Black Quarter of Young Cattle—This is an acute infectious disease of young cattle up to a year old. Occasionally attacking sheep, goats, and swine. The disease is prevalent in the warmer months of the year.

Symptoms—The disease appears very suddenly and from a few hours to three days after the animal is attacked rumination ceases, the back becomes arched, the coat is staring, animals appear weak and stagger when they walk; they trail behind the herd, have a high temperature, pulse is fast and breathe with difficulty. Swellings appear on

TUBERCULOSIS DAY

August 20, Named by Governor Ferris as Day of Observation Throughout State.

The people of the State of Michigan always have been subject to the ravages of tuberculosis, a wholly preventable disease. This disease is the common enemy of mankind, and is rightly called the White Plague. The first manifestations of tuberculosis are frequently overlooked. The patient discovers his danger when it is too late. The Medical Fraternity of Michigan have it in their power to render the State an invaluable service. Their functions are to relieve suffering, cure disease and prevent disease, and the greatest of these three is to prevent disease. Michigan physicians are ready to encourage and practice this form of patriotism—the patriotism of saving their fellowmen from this awful scourge. I suggest that on Friday, August twentieth any person in Michigan desiring a medical examination whereby he may ascertain whether he has any of the symptoms of tuberculosis, may have such examination and advice by asking a physician for it.

Therefore, I, Woodbridge N. Ferris, Governor of the State of Michigan, do hereby designate Friday, August twentieth, A. D. 1915, as Tuberculosis Day, at which time all physicians engaged in the practice of medicine are requested to render this service without charge.

Woodbridge N. Ferris, Governor.
By the Governor:
Coleman C. Vaughan,
Secretary of State.

AN EVENING TO BE REMEMBERED

Young People Entertained Friday Night at Hotel Michigan.

Helen and Roy Babcock Entertain Young Friends and Out of Town Guests.

Last Friday evening proved eventful and one long to be remembered by a number of Charlevoix and out of town young people, when they were royally entertained by Miss Helen and Roy Babcock at the Hotel Michigan.

At 8:30 the doors of the spacious dining room were opened, and to music rendered by the Belvedere orchestra, the merry crowd took their places at the table, and immediately after a five-course supper was served, the tables were cleaned and the remainder of the evening spent in dancing.

After about two hours of this enjoyment all departed for their homes carrying with them the thought that the "Babcocks" were ideal entertainers. The out-of-town guests were Minnie Borst, Margaret Kerwin, Ora Dunn, Earl Beattie, Al Gibson, and Andrew Foster of Petoskey; Martha Krnhenuhl of Spring Station, Ky., and Helen Daniels of Mason.

FORMER RESIDENT DIES AT FLINT

Ransom Cram Answers the Call of "Taps" Last Thursday

Was a Resident of Charlevoix for Many Years—Had Been a Mason for 40 Years.

Ransom Cram of Flint died at the home of his daughter, Mrs. William Campbell at that place last Thursday after an illness of several months. Mr. Cram was one of Charlevoix's pioneer residents and his demise is keenly felt by his many friends.

Ransom Cram was born at Schuyler, New York, December 25, 1834. When but a young man he drove a stage between Sheboygan and Fondulac, later becoming an engineer. In this capacity he ran the second engine that ever passed over the Ogdenburg and Rouses' Point railroad in New York state.

At the time the Civil war started, Mr. Cram enlisted in the 44th Wisconsin infantry and served three years under the noted generals, Sherman, Thomas, Grant and Meredith. He fought in many of the great battles, among them being those of Lookout Mountain, Atlanta and Nashville.

At the close of the war he settled with his family in Wisconsin, where he engaged in the lumber business, later removing to Undine, and thence to Charlevoix, where he retired from business activities in 1902.

Mr. Cram had made his home with his daughter at Flint since 1913, at which place he was taken ill last November, and was compelled to remain in bed since last January. During his entire sickness he was a patient sufferer always looking at the bright side of life. His wife was constantly at his side administering to his every want.

Those who survive are Mrs. Julia O. Cram, his aged wife, Maurice L. Cram and Mrs. Chas. Hale of Bellingham Washington, R. O. Cram, Mrs. George Bacot and Eva Cram of Charlevoix and Mrs. Will Campbell of Flint.

Mr. Cram was a member of the Charlevoix Lodge No. 252 F. A. M. and had been a Mason for over 40 years. The remains were brought from Flint, and buried at Brookside Sunday. The local Masonic order attended the funeral in a body, the services being at the home of Amos Webster Sunday afternoon.

CALLED BY DEATH

Former High School Student Dies Friday After Lingering Illness.

After suffering for a period of weeks from dropsy, death claimed Miss Bessie Howe, the 19 year old daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Henry Howe of Hayes township on Friday last.

The deceased had been a student in the Charlevoix school until illness compelled her to leave early last spring. Although not confined to her bed, she lingered along until about a week previous to her death, when a sudden turn of the disease confined her to her bed until death came as a relief.

Bessie Howe was 19 years, 3 months 6 days of age at the time of her death. She leaves behind a father, mother, three sisters and five brothers, besides a host of friends who will greatly miss her.

Funeral services were held from the home Sunday at 1:30 o'clock, Rev. Quinton Walker, officiating. Interment at Brookside cemetery. The many beautiful flowers showed in a marked degree the esteem in which she was held.

ARE PLANNING A BIG RALLY

Event to be Held at Boyne City, Wednesday, September 22.

Michigan the Home State of the Gleaner Order Says Fred R. Marvin.

The Gleaners of Charlevoix county are planning a grand rally to be held at Boyne City, on September 22. Mr. and Mrs. Fred R. Marvin, Federation Supervisor and assistant respectively, of Detroit, have been holding a series of Local Arlor meetings the past two weeks at Hallowell, Elmira, Boyne Falls, Springvale, Wallon Lake, Bear Creek, Bay Shore, Norwood, Quality, Ironton, Ellsworth, and Central Lake.

Speaking before the Gleaners of Charlevoix, Monday, Mr. Marvin said in part: "While Michigan is the home state of the Gleaner Order, I find that the people of this part of the state have a very limited knowledge of our great agricultural society, in Michigan alone numbering 66,000 members. There is no other association of farmers like it in the world. Not only educational, it has fraternal, benevolent and industrial sides. During the past few years the Gleaners have distributed among their own people over three million dollars in hard cash, and at the present time is caring for the physical wants and needs of over seven thousand persons.

"The co-operative features of the Order have been over-drawn in the imagination of many well-meaning people. The truth is, Michigan Gleaners do not advocate nor encourage farmers to enter the general retail store business, but do promote and encourage the erecting and operating of farmer elevators and warehouses by and for farmers, as a solution of the marketing problem.

"There is nothing unfair and unreasonable about Gleaner co-operation, which would place the business-end of farming in the control of the farmers who produce for sale the nation's foodstuffs. As a natural result of the Gleaner campaign for control of agricultural markets, Michigan farmers are building elevators and warehouses in all parts of the state."

PIKE TOURISTS ARRIVE

Seven Automobiles Arrived in City Last Thursday Morning.

Seven automobiles carrying the Michigan Pike tourists arrived in Charlevoix last Thursday forenoon between ten and eleven o'clock, having made the trip from Traverse City that morning.

In the party were such well known men as Congressman McLoughlin, ex-Congressman G. J. Diekema of Holland, State Highway Commissioner F. F. Rogers of Lansing, Wm. H. Louwitt of Grand Haven, president of the Pike association; President Conger of the association, David H. Day, president of the Western Michigan development Bureau, John I. Gibson, secretary of the bureau, and L. E. Boykin of the United States department of agriculture, also representatives of the Grand Rapids Herald and Press.

Several short speeches were made by members of the party, before they left on their way to Mackinaw City.

ASHORE IN FOG

Steamer Arizona Goes Aground Off Seven Mile Point Saturday Night.

Early Saturday morning the S. S. Arizona of the Goodrich line of boats, of Chicago, enroute to Harbor Springs, ran ashore off Seven Mile point during the dense fog. A large number of passengers were aboard and a heavy load of freight which was brought to Harbor Springs by the steamer Columbia, some of the passengers taking the S. S. Manitou which was in on her regular Saturday trip, others going to Harbor Springs, Petoskey and this city. A wrecking tug from St. Ignace arrived Saturday night and pulled her off the sandbar into deep water.

Butler on Vacation

F. A. Butler, wife and son left last Saturday morning for a visit with the former's brother, C. A. Butler at Valparaiso, Indiana, making the trip by auto. Mr. Butler will attend the meeting of the state association of Rural Carriers at Holland, July 20 and 21, going on from there to Indiana. The party plans to tour eastern Indiana and return home by the east coast line of Michigan, arriving here about August 5th. Leo Smith will substitute as carrier No. 1 during Mr. Butler's vacation.

WOULD HONOR REX BEACH

Steps Being Taken to Mark Early Home With Boulder and Tablet.

Manager Williams of the Telephone Company in Petoskey, has a plan for marking the birthplace of Rex Beach, the author who was born and reared on a farm not far from Norwood, in the southwest corner of Charlevoix county.

The old farm on which this well-known writer spent his boyhood days is on the main line of the West Michigan pike, and Mr. Williams believes it might prove an interesting thing if a huge boulder was placed beside the road and a suitable bronze tablet placed on it. The old farm house is situated in a large arched some little distance back from the road but can be plainly seen as one passes the place.

Of all the writers who have spent their early life in Northern Michigan, Rex Beach is probably the best known at this time, and we believe the marking of his old home as suggested by Mr. Williams will meet with considerable enthusiastic favor with motorists.

Mr. Williams believes a fund could be raised by popular subscription and that the marking of the spot might be made under the auspices of the West Michigan Pike Association.—Petoskey Evening News.

LOOKING FOR A SITE

Celebrated Labor Leaders Working on Plan for a Summer Colony.

Former United States Senator R. F. Pettigrew of South Dakota, Mrs. Bertha Smith and Mr. and Mrs. C. S. Darrow of Chicago, are inspecting various locations in this section. They are looking for a large tract of land upon which is to be established a colony of summer resorters composed of their friends from the west.

The have looked over land in and around Traverse City, Neahawanda and Old Mission, and the latter part of the week were in this city on their way to Norwood to look over land in this vicinity.

Both Senator Pettigrew and Attorney Darrow are men of national prominence, the latter being the well known attorney who defended the McNamara brothers in the famous Los Angeles Times dynamiting affair. The visitors have been much impressed with the beauty and advantages of the summering places in this part of Michigan and it is a probability rather than a mere possibility that they will recommend to their friends a location in this region.

Growing Sweet Clover in Western Michigan

Samuel Willis of Thompsonville Tells of His Early Experiences—Interesting Information.

As to its ever becoming a troublesome weed, it should be remembered that any plant that is an annual or biennial will never become any more troublesome than red clover. Furthermore you do not find this plant in cultivated fields as you do weeds, and it is easily killed by cultivation.

As to stock eating it I can say from experience that all domestic animals will eat it as well as other clovers. Owing to the peculiar flavor individual animals sometimes do not take to it at first, but all kinds of live stock learn to like it and eat it greedily and thrive on it, preferring it to any other forage.

I want to say to you tillers of the soil that when you go to town and buy protein in the shape of cotton seed meal, to get a balanced ration for your stock, you are stepping over a five dollar bill and picking up a dollar, and I think you will agree with me that this is not good business sense to be buying nitrogen for the soil and protein for the stock when you can furnish both right on your own farm.

It is strange that in looking for fortunes we often pass up the golden treasures right at our own door.

PEG O' MY HEART

A Comedy of Youth Founded by Mr. Manners on His Great Play of the Same Title—Illustrations From Photographs of the Play

SYNOPSIS.

Frank O'Connell, young Irish patriot, is shot and wounded by British soldiers while making a home rule speech. He is aided by Angela Kingsnorth, an English society girl, who defends him.

Angela takes O'Connell to her brother's home and helps to nurse him. He recovers, and he and the girl become fast friends.

CHAPTER III.

The Irish Patriot.

SO far no man in the little walled zone she had lived in had ever stirred Angela to an even momentary enthusiasm. They were all so fatuously contented with their environment. Sheltered from birth, their anxiety was chiefly how to make life pass the pleasantest. They occasionally showed a spasmodic excitement over the progress of a cricket or polo match. Their achievements were largely those of the stay at home warriors who fought with the quill what others faced death with the sword for. Their hereditary disgust for her. Their self-satisfaction spurred her to resentment.

Here was a man in the real heart of life. He was engaged in a struggle that makes existence worth while—the effort to bring a message to his people. Then arose a picture of her sister, Monica, with her pious social pretensions—recognition of those in a higher grade, bread and meat and drink to her; adulation and gross flattery, the very breath of her nostrils; her brother's cheap, narrow platitudes about the rights of rank and wealth.

The memory of her mother was the only link that bound her to her childhood—the gentle, uncomplaining spirit of her, the unselfish abnegation of her, the soul's tragedy of her, giving up her life at the altar of duty at the bidding of a hardened despot.

She was roused from her self-searching thoughts by the doctor's voice and the touch of his hand.

"Goodby for the present, Miss Kingsnorth. Sure it's in good hands I'm leaving him. But for you he'd be lying in the black jail with old Dr. Costello glarin' down at him with his gimlet eyes."

Angela sat down at a little distance from the sickbed and watched the wounded man. His face was drawn with pain. His eyes were closed. But he was not sleeping. His fingers locked and unlocked. His lips moved. He opened his eyes and looked at her.

"You need not stay here," he said. "Would you rather I didn't?"

"Why did you bring me here?"

"To make sure your wounds were attended to."

"Your brother is a landlord—Kingsnorth, the absentee landlord, we used to call your father as children. And I'm in his son's house. I'd better be in jail than here."

"You mustn't think that."

"You've brought me here to humiliate me—to humiliate me."

"No. To care for you, to protect you."

"Protect me?"

"If I can."

"That's strange."

"I heard you speak today." She paused. "You mustn't go to prison."

"It's the lot of every Irishman today who says what he thinks."

"It mustn't be yours! It mustn't!"

Angela's voice rose in her distress. She repeated: "It mustn't! I'll appeal to my brother to stop it!"

"If he's anything like his father it's small heed he'll pay to your pleading. The poor wretches here appealed to old Kingsnorth in famine and sickness—not for help, mind ye, just for a little time to pay their rents—and the only answer they ever got from him was 'Pay or get'."

"I know, I know!" Angela replied. "And many a time when I was a child my mother and I cried over it."

If the American farmer has a fancy for figures, he can find some interesting facts set forth in statistics contained in a pamphlet just issued by the Department of Commerce under the title: "Trade of the United States with other American Countries, 1913-1914." Unfortunately, the statistics deal with a fiscal year, and not with a period fixed by change in economic politics. The figures regarding imports deal with the year ending with June 30, in each instance, whereas the new tariff law, which exerts so large an influence upon imports, went into effect early in October, 1913.

It is therefore apparent that the statistics for 1913 includes a full twelve months under a Republican tariff while the figures for 1914 cover three months of Republican tariff and nine months of Democratic rates on imports. As the European war did not break out until August, 1914, the commercial transactions covered by the bulletin were entirely free from any war influence. A few illustrations of changes in imports of farm products will be illuminative.

In 1913 Canadian farmers sold to buyers in the United States cattle, horses, sheep, etc., to the value of a little more than $1,500,000 but in 1914 they cut into the market of the American farmer to the extent of $11,000,000. That gain of $9,500,000 was enough to make quite a jingle in the pockets of the Canadian stockgrower.

In 1913, Canadian farmers sold in American markets only $2,750,000 worth of grain and flour but in 1914 they were able to ship in enough of the same commodities to take away $12,400,000 of good American money. That is $9,650,000 to the gain of the Canadian producer. Wool imports from Canada gained $1,000,000 in 1914 as compared with 1913.

Those four classes of commodities, live stock, grain, hides and wool, constituting the foundation of agriculture yielded the Canadian producer a gain of over $22,000,000 in American markets under Democratic as compared with Republican tariff laws.

But it was not Canadian farmers alone that profited by the reduction or removal of tariff duties on farm products. Mexican stockmen increased their sales in the United States about $5,500,000; Argentinian farmers augmented their incomes to the extent of $7,000,000 by sales of grain; nearly $6,000,000 by sales of meat and dairy products and $2,000,000 by sales of wool.

Agricultural producers in these and other countries were aided in selling other products in American markets, but the items mentioned above give the larger amounts of increased sales and serve to illustrate the manner in which reduced tariffs on agricultural imports throw the American farmer into competition with farmers of other nations.

The war in Europe served to give those other countries a more profitable market than the United States, but the increase of $42,500,000 in agricultural imports from three nations, in a period of nine months of a new tariff, indicates what still greater injury would have been suffered by American producers had not the war intervened.

John was in his class reciting and his teacher asks: "John, tell me how many bones are in your body?" "208, teacher." "Wrong, John, the human body has only 207." "But I swallowed a fish bone this morning," declared John.

An old married man happened to meet a beaming bridegroom on the latter's first day at business after the wedding trip. "Hello," said he, "finished your honeymoon yet?" "I don't know," replied the happy husband smiling. "I have never been able to determine the exact meaning of the word honeymoon." "Well, then, has your wife commenced to do the cooking yet?"

Bessie never saw a baseball game before. When the teams representing the office and factory departments of the Kohler plant at Sheboygan, Wis., lined up on the field and began playing, she became interested. She wandered nearer, until she finally stood within 10 feet of the plate. Suddenly the bat slipped from the player's hand. It struck Bessie right between the eyes. Bessie was a perfectly good cow. She's beef now.

As a married couple were walking down one of the main thoroughfares of a city the husband noted the attention which other women obtained from passers-by and remarked to his better-half, "Folks never look at you. I wish I had married someone better looking." The woman tartly replied, "It's your fault. Do you think a man will stare at me when you are walking with me? You stop behind and see whether men don't look at me." The husband hung back about a dozen yards, and for the length of the street was surprised to see every man his wife passed stare hard at her and even turn around and look after her. "Sure, lassie," he exclaimed as he rejoined her. "I was wrong and take it back. I'll never say aught about your looks again." The wife had made a face at every man she met. That was her little game.

"A Modern Cinderella."

The seat sale for "A MODERN CINDERELLA" opens at the Central Drug Store on Aug. 4. The demand for seats for this attraction which will come to the Charlevoix Theatre on Aug. 5 for one night only, is very large and a full house is anticipated by the management, owing to the flattering advance reports on the show. The attraction combines all that is best in musical comedy, and is replete with many wonderful scenic and electrical devices that thrill and delight. Special attention has been displayed in the selection of the cast and chorus, and the costumes are on a par with other large musical shows out of New York this season.

On Wednesday evening, July 28, the four-reel Mutual masterpiece "Enoch Arden" will be shown by The Majestic Motion Picture corporation. The picture was from the celebrated poem by Lord Alfred Tennyson.

Pearl-Loop.

Mr. Walter W. Pearl and Miss Elizabeth A. Loop, both of Harbor Springs, were married at the Congregational parsonage in this city last Sunday afternoon, July 18, by Rev. C. E. Taggart. Mr. Pearl is an architect, and Mrs. Pearl has taught in the Harbor Springs schools for six years. They will make their home in Harbor Springs for the present. They are young people of unusual promise, and the best wishes of their friends attend them as they enter life together.

Kennedy-Dilworth.

The M. E. parsonage was the scene of a very quiet wedding on Monday of last week when Miss Katherine Kennedy was united in marriage to Wesley Dilworth by Rev. M. W. Duffey. Both young people are well known in this city. Miss Kennedy was a member of the class of 1914 and Mr. Dilworth took special work in the high school a few years ago. Mr. Dilworth is of Horton Bay, where he has been engaged producing, buying and shipping for several years. He is highly esteemed by his business associates as well as his large number of personal friends.—Boyer Citizen.

and these are the essentials for an alfalfa meadow. And I feel that if this teaching was done by talking sweet clover first and then alfalfa, better results would follow. I do not wish you to get the idea that I am a sweet clover crank, but I am confident of its value and know that when I first commenced farming and tried alfalfa I failed until I had first grown sweet clover to put into the soil the requirements for alfalfa. After doing this I have been able to raise during the season of 1914 three cuttings, or six tons per acre, of as nice bright alfalfa hay as any one could wish for, and this was grown on light sandy soil.

Now, land is worth what it can produce, that is what sets the value on it, and I contend that 90 per cent of the land in Michigan can be brought up in production so that the value will be one hundred to one hundred twenty-five dollars per acre instead of twenty and twenty-five dollars as it is now, for to my mind every acre into sweet clover or alfalfa, will pay interest on a valuation of two hundred dollars per acre.

Should any of you be interested in sweet clover no doubt you would like to know a few things about its culture. The ground should be fitted the same as for alfalfa. And if the soil is not inoculated it should be inoculated with the soil, or seed should be inoculated with pure bacteria culture.

The amount of seed used per acre is from 15 to 20 lbs. of hulled seed. Good seed is also an essential, and it should be remembered that from the testing of samples it has been found that the northern seed is preferable to the southern grown, as it is of stronger vitality, germinates more readily, and contains less hard seeds. The time for seeding varies according as to what you want the crop for but would advise from May first to not later than the last of July.

For if sown later it might not get a good root growth before winter. The earlier seeding will produce more hay and pasture the first year, and you need not be afraid to turn out the stock on it as it is large enough, or pasture it late in the fall. The next year you can pasture until June first and then cut a hay crop, or a seed crop or pasture it the whole season turning on not less than one head per acre, getting them early so as to keep growth eaten down.

If you wish the crop of hay cut it when about two or three feet high, just before it buds, when it still resembles alfalfa. And set your mower rather high, then another hay crop may be gathered or you can cut a seed crop, or plow under the last crop for fertilizer. Or you can grow it the whole season for seed, but this makes a very heavy growth. In harvesting for seed, I would advise the use of a binder, setting the machine high, so as to avoid having too much straw to feed through the huller, and also to leave more stubble on the ground for fertilizer. The straw you will find has as much feeding value as timothy hay.

Another way is to raise this crop for green manure, plowing it under when about 18 or 20 inches high, and I see from Bulletin No. 485 issued by Mr. Westgate, of Washington, D. C., that in doing this one would put down about 30 tons of green manure per acre in roots, tops and leaves; so if one turned under a whole season's growth they could figure about sixty tons of green manure per acre, which would do considerable toward fixing up a pretty poor piece of land.

I have also used sweet clover in my cherry orchard, as a clover crop, cutting it twice a year and spreading around the trees as a mulch, this saves cultivation and also adds humus and nitrogen to the soil, and I figure that every acre used this way is equal to 25 loads of barnyard manure.

In closing let me ask, does not sweet clover come as near the requirements of an ideal forage crop as any you know of? While alfalfa is good it is a dainty plant and a particular chooser of soils and climate, it requires special tillage and inoculation, has numerous insect enemies, and will not stand close pasturing; while sweet clover, is a hardy, vigorous grower, thrives anywhere, inoculates readily, has no insect enemies or troublesome diseases, and stands all kinds of use and abuse. Some farmers have the idea that the plow and hoe are the only producers of value on the farm, but when one stops to think that our forage crops are of more value than any of the cereals, and when we consider that the profits from beef, pork, mutton, the dairy and poultry are all from the pasture rather than from the corn crib or granary—will we not then appreciate forage crops more? And rejoice in the fact that sweet clover so long kept in obscurity has come to our rescue as a pasture, forage and soil building plant?

I trust I have not found so much fault that I have discouraged any students who may have listened, or any of the short course fellows here, and I want to say fairly and squarely that I do not consider that any one is making a mistake in becoming a tiller of the soil. I have been in the mercantile business, the lumbering and manufacturing business and other lines, still I find there is a quietness about the life of a farmer and the hope of a serene old age that no other business or profession can promise.

A professional man is doomed some day to find his powers wanting; he is doomed to see the younger and stronger man pass him in life's race.

But the farmer lives with the trees and flowers, and breathes the sweet air of the fields, there is not that constant and frightful strain upon his mind; he is away from the wild rush for money; and his nights are filled with sleep and rest. And there is nothing about the plowing of the fields to make a man cruel, cross or enbided.

GRAVE PERIL TO ALFALFA.

Weevil From Europe Threatens Crop. Close Watch Advised.

Alfalfa growers everywhere should be on the lookout for the alfalfa weevil, which was introduced into Utah several years ago from Europe and is doing much damage there and has spread over into Idaho.

There is no reason to doubt that it would spread and multiply in the states further east if it were once introduced.

This is an impending calamity to the whole country. By keeping watch we may be able to call its appearance to the attention of our experiment stations and the United States department of agriculture, so that war may be waged on the pest in time.

The alfalfa weevil is a small beetle about the size of a grain of wheat. The mature bugs eat holes in the does not believe any cow could be expected to manufacture a lot of milk out of nothing or without a place to hold it. He says what he picks for is a big, strong cow with a big feed bucket; a large—not fat—udder; large, deep eyes; a deep yellow skin and a happy disposition that allows her to go to sleep chewing her cud while you milk her. This is the kind of cow that tempts this writer, whether he has his testing outfit with him or not.

It has often been observed that some of the biggest producers have been passed up in the ring when judged Professor H. H. Dean of the University of Wisconsin says: "We find in our experience that Holstein calves are strong and good doers. I have never known, in my experience with them, a calf to come weak and a calf that required nursing and required extra attention. Without exception they come strong, and in two or three weeks we can put them on skim milk and soon begin to feed them corn and oats, and they begin to thrive from the start." The illustration shows a fine type of Holstein.

shapely from the standpoint of appearance. The Guernsey cow Marie Cowan, a famous milk producer, does not have all the points going to make up what we call type in dairy cattle. She does have the fundamentals of a dairy cow. She has the deep, long body or the place to put a lot of feed and undoubtedly has a wonderful constitution and a specially developed circulatory system. She is heavy over the shoulders, and her back is not straight. Her hip bones are higher than the pin bones. She does not have the dish face nor the ideal color marking of the breed. In spite of these deficiencies she has demonstrated her right to the championship.

It is sometimes said that conformation is the first thing to consider in dairy stock. The man who is going to milk the cow should consider first the milk she is going to give. If he is buying young milked heifers, investigating their relationship with advanced registry records should be an important consideration. These records demonstrate that the young heifers are at least the immediate offspring of high producers.

Treatment For Garget.

There is probably no better treatment for garget than frequent bathing the udder with hot water, accompanied by hand rubbing. The rubbing perhaps is the more important part of the treatment. The milk, of course, should be removed frequently, using the milking tube where it cannot be removed in the ordinary manner. In many cases the application of the hot water treatment with the rubbing will effect a cure. In the more stubborn cases the use of an ointment of camphor gum and melted lard is to be recommended. This should be applied with liberal rubbing.—Kansas Farmer.

Cause of Tuberculosis.

Tuberculosis is caused by bacteria. These micro-organisms find their way into the system of the animal, and when conditions are right they produce tuberculosis. In other words, an animal does not develop this disease unless it comes in contact with tubercular germs.

THE PROFITABLE CAPON.

The best capons are hatched in early spring and operated upon during early summer, before extremely hot weather begins, says the Country Gentleman. The birds are then ready for market during and after the holiday season.

Cockerels of any breed can be made to increase in weight by being caponized. The larger breeds will permit of much greater gains and are therefore more desirable. For the production of capons on the farm the Plymouth Rocks are among the best fowls to keep, since the females may be kept for eggs and all surplus cockerels caponized.

June and July are the best months for the work, because spring hatched chicks reach proper size then and also because birds caponized at this time arrive at the proper age and weight for marketing at the season when there is the greatest demand and the best prices prevail.

DAIRY WISDOM.

If you have no silo plant the corn to fill one and build the silo while the corn is growing. Six or eight cows will warrant a silo. The dairy cow is like a good machine—she requires attention and care. The care must be thorough and consistent.

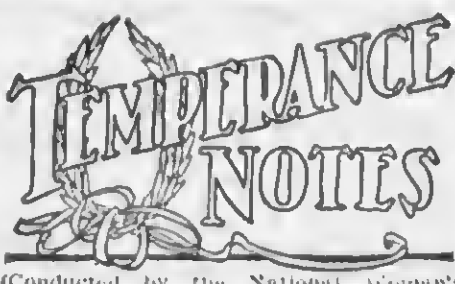

The dairy bull has an influence on the heifers of the entourage, while the cow influences one calf each year.

In order to know whether a cow is profitable or not you must know what she eats and what she yields. Either alone is not sufficient.

Carelessness is one of the most common causes of failure on the dairy farm. Look to your work and to the details every day.

Very Dry.

A codfish breakfast and a rubber coat will keep a man dry all day.—Lippincott's.

THE FULL DINNER PAIL.

"Everybody's Magazine," in its new department, "Keep Posted," narrates and comments in a recent number as follows:

"Wine-woman-and-song has gone up against dollars-and-cents in Lansing, Mich., and the result is one of the most notable so far achieved in America. The most prominent leader of the drys is not an evangelist, nor any other sort of custodian of the soul. He is simply a commercial person—R. H. Scott.

"In the year 1910, in the factory of which Mr. Scott is manager, in a period of ten successive weeks, the employees lost a total of 323 working days—and the wages of those days—because of not being able to recover promptly from party nights spent in saloons.

"In the dry-versus-wet campaign in 1910 in Lansing Mr. Scott fought for morals and economics. Nevertheless the campaign did not please all of Lansing's business men. They thought that a dry town would lose business to wet towns near by. So, two years later, Lansing went wet again.

"This gave everybody a wonderful chance to compare a dry Lansing with a wet Lansing, commercially.

"First, as for the cost of running the government, it was soon found that a wet Lansing had to spend a good deal of money supporting its wet citizens. One of many proofs was this: the cost of feeding the prisoners in the county jail during the two years while Lansing was dry had been $5,600, while during the two ensuing years of wetness the cost of feeding them (at the same rate per person) was $11,300. Quite a difference for a town of 40,000.

"Second, as for business itself, scores of merchants were converted to the proposition that the competition of saloons in nearby wet towns would not be half so injurious to them as the competition of saloons on Lansing's own streets. Their experiences may be summarized into the statement of a butcher who remarked merely that when the town was dry he could collect his back bills, and when it was wet he couldn't.

"In the last dry-versus-wet campaign in Lansing the merchants did not rally to the support of the flowing bowl at all. They turned to the overflowing pay envelope and the paid-up accounts. The issue discussed was prosperity, and the majority for going to it sober was 1,200.

"The efficiency of the factory is at least 10 per cent higher dry than wet, according to Mr. Scott.

"And a similar result is shown in the cost figures furnished to Everybody's Magazine by Mr. C. E. Beiment, general manager of another company. In a dry Lansing—and for no reason except dryness and greater sobriety and energy—the cost of making engines by this concern has gone down 70 cents per horse power."

PERTINENT QUESTIONS.

(Asked by the Temperance Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church.)

Let us look these questions squarely in the eye.

Does the liquor traffic pay the United States?

Does it pay financially?

Does it pay commercially?

Does it pay industrially?

Does it pay physically?

Does it pay mentally?

Does it pay morally?

What single good thing can be said for the trade in liquors or the habit of drinking alcohol?

Nothing?

Then why not kill the traffic without further delay?

If we cannot kill it let us hang our heads in bitter humiliation, for it is greater than we.

If we can kill it, then in God's name let us do it!

FOOD FOR TAXPAYER.

Census bureau statistics show that for the year 1913 the liquor revenue received by state, county and municipal governments amounted to only $79,516,959, or a per capita of 82 cents. This includes all incorporated places of 2,500 people and over. This liquor revenue constituted only 4.3 per cent of the total state, county and municipal revenues, $1,845,901,128. To put it simply, the states, counties and cities got a total revenue of $19 per capita and a liquor revenue of only $0.82.

Inasmuch as the per capita drink bill of the American people is in excess of $23, it is apparent that we spend about $1 for every three and one-half cents returned to the states, counties and cities by the liquor traffic.

A JUST DECISION.

All social clubs of Atlanta, Ga., have been prohibited from dispensing liquor in any form. Claims of exclusiveness or aristocracy will cause no distinction in Chief of Police Weaver's ultimatum. Ugly democracy will govern all enforcement measures; the rich will not be permitted violations for which the poorer people are held accountable.

This decision has been won by the persistent work of Messrs. Eagan and Jackson, the "Men and Religion" advertising men of Atlanta.

FIELD OF ALFALFA IN FLOURISHING CONDITION.

alfalfa leaves and lay eggs in the holes. The eggs are of a lemon yellow color. They hatch out into grubs which are greenish in color, with a white line along the back, and of course are rather small, being the offspring of a beetle no larger than a wheat grain.

The grubs feed on the alfalfa leaves and sometimes destroy them completely.

No more serious danger confronts the agriculture of the country than is found in the possibility of the spread of this little bug into the states east of the Rocky mountains.

Inspect your alfalfa plants for the little holes close to a bud. If they are made by a little grub send one specimen to the entomologist at your experiment station and another to the bureau of plant industry at Washington, and write a letter to go with each specimen, telling the story of your find.

Professor Gillette of the Colorado station advises farmers not to receive shipments of bulky merchandise like potatoes, fruit or nursery stock from those regions of Utah or Idaho where this insect occurs, unless the goods have been thoroughly disinfected. It would seem the part of wisdom for the government to adopt preventive measures.

Alfalfa For Hogs.

There is really no more profitable pasture for hogs than alfalfa. It should not be stocked too heavily in pasturing, the surplus growth being mowed whenever it needs it. Good hay results from that portion which the hogs do not eat, and the new that comes up is fresh and well liked by the hogs. If is not mowed swine are apt to eat it in patches, killing parts altogether.

Weight of Peking Ducks.

Peking ducks should weigh more than five pounds. The standard weight of the duck is seven pounds and that of the drake eight. They are creamy white, with bright orange colored beaks and legs. A well bred, well cared for Peking duckling should weigh five pounds at ten weeks of age.

THE KIND OF COW FOR THE DAIRYMAN

The dairyman working for results is not much concerned in fancy breeding or fancy points unless the cow can make good at the pail. The difficulty of selecting cows by their looks that will fill this requirement is apparent to all. The writer, says the editor of the Kansas Farmer, dislikes attempting to place a bunch of dairy cows in the judging ring more than the placing of any other class of live stock. After we have placed the cows we are always on the lookout for some one to come forward with the figures to prove that we are wrong.

The man who goes out to buy cows, however, must depend to some extent on appearances. A writer in Board's Dairyman says that in buying a cow there are two things he looks for and expects the cow to possess—first, a place to hold feed and, second, a place to hold milk. This cowman says he

WOODS THAT SINK.

There Are Many Varieties That Will Not Float in Water.

That wood floats is such a common-place fact in our lives that we hardly give it any thought. If we lived in tropical climates we would learn to distinguish between woods that float and woods that do not float. Many of the woods of Mexico and South America are so heavy even when perfectly dry that they will sink in water, notably lignum vitae, which is the wood commonly used for bowling balls.

Among our common native woods there are several that will not float when green. The cypress of the south is often girdled a year before it is cut so that it will die and dry while standing, thus making it possible to float the logs to the mill.

The reason why some woods float is not because the substance of which they are made is lighter than water, but because the cavities in the cells are so large that the air in them buoy up the wood. The material (cellulose) which composes the greater part of the cell wall is heavier than water, so that if the air in the cells is replaced by water the wood will sink. This is just what happens to wood which has been in water for a long time and has become "waterlogged."

It is the large water content of the heartwood of freshly felled oaks and hickories and of the sapwood of certain conifers that causes these woods to sink, for when dry they will float.

Lignum vitae and other heavy tropical woods, even when dry, sink because most of the cell cavities are so small compared to the thick cell walls that the air in the cavities is not enough to float the wood.

CULTIVATE RELIABILITY.

It is Always in Demand and Adds to a Men's Worth.

The demand for reliability never ceases. If you buy a piece of machinery you want it to be dependable. When you purchase new clothes you desire them to be durable. If you elect an official you require that he shall be trustworthy. When you take on an employee you inquire whether he can be relied on as to his word, his work, his loyalty. It is so in all the relations of life. While there is much unreliability, you never hear of anybody seeking it or placing a premium upon it.

The reliable man is always spoken of in terms of praise. His friends boast that he can be depended upon to do a certain thing under a certain set of circumstances without variability or shadow of turning. They say they can find him in the dark and can trust him then with the same faith as in the broad light of day. They refer to him as one whom you can tie to. They have no fears that he will either default or betray. He has all the steadiness and fidelity of a well-trained plow horse. He may lack brilliancy and flash. He may not be a genius. But as far as his abilities go he is as reliable as true steel, and thus he becomes more or less of an institution in the circle within which he moves and an anchor for those dependent upon him in any way whatever.—Pittsburgh Gazette-Times.

Anneke Van Winkle's Wit

A Story of an Old Dutch Town.

By F. A. MITCHEL

The city of Schenectady, N. Y., until the latter part of the nineteenth century was a sleepy Dutch village.

In the early days, when the Indians used to come into Schenectady to dispose of their pelts in exchange for various articles, the principal of which was firewater, there lived in the town a young man named Heleger Van Tromp. He was in love with Anneke Van Winkle, a fine specimen of a Dutch girl, who, when wearing all the petticoats she possessed, looked very much like a humming top.

Some twenty miles from Schenectady the remains of a historical mansion that was occupied by Sir William Johnson, prominent in colonial times, still stand. A fur trader named Martin Smith lived in that region and made frequent trips to Schenectady in the way of business. On one of his trips he caught sight of Anneke Van Winkle and fell violently in love with her. A neighbor of Heleger's told him that he had better look out for his sweet heart, for the Englishman was then at her house begging her to go back with him to the Long house, as the residence of Sir William Johnson was called.

This is the only recorded case of Heleger showing any animation. He got up from his chair, dropping his pipe, which was shattered, and rushed to Anneke's house. Smith saw him coming, his eyes averted, and with discretion withdrew. Heleger chased him out of the town, and when the former returned his shirt was bloody.

It was supposed that the Dutchman had given the Englishman nothing more than a good rousing until a man came in from Johnson's to learn what had become of Smith, for he had come to Schenectady for a day only, and though a week had passed he had not returned. The fact that when Heleger had come back from chasing his would-be rival blood was on his clothing was proof to the Dutchman that he had killed Smith. A search was made for the body, but it was not found. But this had little weight for it was supposed that the latter had been hurled it.

Heleger was tried and convicted. The fact that Smith had disappeared after having been chased, that blood was on the shirt of the man who had chased him, was quite enough for those who tried Van Tromp without wasting words over any possible explanation. The Dutchman of that period was not imaginative or ingenious. What was before his eyes he saw; of what might be behind his back he took no note. That Heleger had killed the man who sought to take his sweet heart from him they did not doubt. Some were inclined to leniency on account of the provocation, but these were overruled by the wise heads who declared that murder was murder and that was all there was about it. So Heleger was condemned to be hanged one month from the day on which he was convicted.

Anneke received the verdict stolidly. At least she appeared to do so, though her face was so fat that it is not probable any change of expression could appear in her lineaments. Nevertheless she loved Heleger, and her love for him had been much enhanced on seeing him rush away from the man who had thrust his attention upon her. She went to her home, sat down in the living room and, taking up her knitting, began to think, for Anneke could never think unless her fingers were working the needles.

It would be a mistake to suppose that because Anneke's face was as round as an apple and her little eyes were set above a pair of exuberant cheeks she had no power of thought. She had a considerable thinking apparatus—that is, for those times in the stupid Dutch town in which she lived. And she was not so slow in her thoughts as one would suppose. While she was knitting a pair of stockings she thought out a plan by which she might possibly save her lover from the gallows. It was not a plan that would work in any other age or among any other people, but for them it was admirably adapted, for the Schenectady burglar was a man accustomed to moving in a single plane. Out of that plane he at once became befogged and could not move at all.

There was in those days one church in which all the people of Schenectady worshipped. In its steeple was a clock that furnished them the time. The sun might rise and set irregularly, but the clock went right on just the same. Indeed, it would have been treason to doubt its accuracy, for it was the only calendar in the town. By the hour it marked all things were decided. If a man promised to pay a sum of money in thirty days the expiration of the period was not marked by the fact that the sun had risen and set thirty times, but that the hour-hand of the clock had noted the passage of thirty days.

The people in Schenectady were used in those days to getting up at 6 in the morning. One morning a large number of persons awaiting at their usual time were surprised that they remained awake an hour before the clock struck 6. But they were slow in comparing notes, and even if they had done so they would not have suspected that there was anything wrong with the clock. They would have attributed the fact that so many of them had lain awake an hour in the morning to coincidence.

The next morning when the people awoke they discovered that the clock instead of registering 6 or 5, as it had done the morning before, registered 4. This circumstance created a greater disturbance in the village than anything that had ever occurred there since the great Indian massacre. It was evident that the clock had lost considerable time, for two days before the sun had risen at 6, and now when the clock struck that hour the sun was high in the heavens.

Had the clock been a few minutes too slow or too fast, even had the burghers known it, they would not have wondered. As it was they did not know what to make of it. So great was their faith in their timepiece that instead of thinking it wrong they laid the blame on the sun, though many of them preferred to believe that the devil had got into the belfry and had interfered with the mechanism. A committee of three was appointed to sit up and watch the hands to see when the change took place. The dial was lighted by a full moon, and they could see it distinctly. By 10 o'clock they had drunk so much schnapps that they saw a marvelous sight. The hands spun round like the spokes of a rapidly revolving wagon wheel, first forward and then backward, stopping at 9. This settled the matter. The devil was at work in the belfry.

When twelve days had passed the burghers began to notice that each morning the clock was getting nearer their rising hour, though now it seemed to be gaining instead of losing, and before four weeks had passed it had come right again. Then they concluded that the devil had tired of fooling with it and had let it alone, for it went on steadily for twenty-four days after it had commenced its antics.

Meanwhile the date of Heleger Van Tromp's execution approached. The morning of the execution Anneke Van Winkle went to the judge of the court and said:

"Your worship, I have a confession to make."

"What is it, Anneke?" asked the judge.

"It is in connection with the hanging of Heleger Van Tromp. What day was he sentenced to be hanged?"

"Friday; that is today."

"What is the matter with you, Anneke? Has the loss of your lover made you mad?"

"No, your worship. I say it is Saturday, because we have lost a day. Every night for twenty-four days I have climbed to the belfry of the church and turned the hands of the clock back an hour."

"Did you do that, Anneke?"

"Yes."

The judge began to puzzle his brain over the question as to whether a day had been lost or not by the setting back of the clock. But, not reaching any conclusion, he sent word to the sheriff not to execute the prisoner until further orders. Then he called in the most prominent citizens and stated the case to them, asking their opinion whether, Anneke having set back the hands of the clock twenty-four hours, the day on which Heleger Van Tromp was to be executed had passed.

The question struck those to whom it was propounded as the most difficult they had ever been called upon to solve. After an hour's babel, during which some maintained one side and some another and frequent shifting from one side to the other, it was decided that the matter was too important to be decided in a hurry, and they all adjourned to a place where they could procure schnapps and tobacco.

When the hour of noon came—the time the hanging had been ordered—the debate was still going on and had extended to every person in the village. Never had there been such excitement in the sleepy old town since the day of the great Indian fight in 1690. A man would be of one opinion while his wife took the opposite view. They quarreled. Fathers and sons, mothers and daughters contended, and before midnight all the lovers in town were estranged.

The next morning, there being doubt whether the day was Saturday or Sunday, the trouble broke out afresh. Some called on the doctrine to hold service; others declared that the church should not be opened. This caused a riot at the door of the sanctuary, those trying to get in being attacked by those trying to keep the church shut.

During the afternoon a man was seen crossing the Mohawk river in a boat. It was agreed that this person, who doubtless came from the Long house, he asked whether the day was Saturday or Sunday. When he came near enough for the people to distinguish his features he was seen to be Martin Smith, the "murdered" man.

Every man and woman and child, being more interested in the date than the legal aspects involved in Smith's return, met him with the question, "What day is this?" He was so startled that he could not tell them till he had examined memoranda he had in his pocket; then he declared that it was Saturday.

The question of the hanging was settled not only by the return of the supposed victim, but from the fact that the day set for the execution had passed. The people were beside themselves with joy that they had not hung Heleger and took Anneke, whose wit had saved him, on their shoulders and carried her to the jail, where her lover was set free, and they insisted that a wedding service be performed immediately.

So the domineer was called, and the pair were married.

What Did She Mean?

The two young ladies had gushed and "dearied" each other until the other passengers in the train were heartily sick of it, especially as they never lost a chance of getting in a nasty cut at each other.

Just before they parted Angelina obliged Emmeline with a stamp for a letter.

"Oh, I must give you a penny for this," exclaimed Emmeline, as she prepared to leave the car.

"Don't bother, dear," cooed Angelina.

"Give it to me next time I see you."

"But you mayn't see me for a long time," protested Emmeline.

"Oh, well, the loss wouldn't be great!" cooed Angelina, more sweetly than ever.—London Answers.

F. M. Glassford, wife and daughter, Hilda, left on Thursday last for a ten days visit among friends and relatives at Flint, Port Huron and Capac. We understand that Mr. Glassford will make the return trip in a new Buick automobile.

Mrs. Nellie Connor, who lives on what is known as the Nat Burns farm south of the city, announces that she has opened a tea room at her farm, and extends an invitation to all to give her a call. She will make a specialty of lunches, chicken dinners, etc. The farm is a beautiful place to stop and no doubt Mrs. Connor will have the opportunity of serving a large number of people.

Coast Guards in Future Will Be Armed at All Times.

Crew Will Be Trained So That in Time of War They Can Be Called to Join Navy.

All coast guards in the future will be armed. The life saving service hitherto has been a civil institution. It is now in process of organization as a military establishment, for use in case of war. Every surferman is to have his Krag rifle, and will be regularly enlisted, instead of hired for the season, as heretofore. Each life saving station will be provided with one machine gun, and the keeper will hold rank as captain.

Rifle practice, and plenty of it, will be in peace time a part of the routine business of every station, in order that the men may become expert sharpshooters.

They will dig trenches in the sand of the beach, and with machine gun and Krag will defend the shore line against attack by landing parties of an imaginary enemy.

Immediately upon the outbreak of war the service (now renamed the coast guard) will automatically become an adjunct of the navy, and as such it will have assigned to it the important duty of protecting the naval wireless plants along all along our coasts at intervals of two hundred miles.

The first thing likely to be attempted by an enemy is to capture and disable these outposts for distributing intelligence. Each wireless plant will be a communication by telephone and telegraph with all the life saving stations for a distance of hundreds of miles; and, under the system now being organized, an emergency summons will call out from each station a sea-going power boat carrying a machine gun and a dozen or more armed men.

True within a surprisingly short time, a formidable body of defenders will be assembled. Hastily throwing up intrenchments along the beach—the best fortification in the world is a bank of sand—they will be able to offer dangerous opposition to an invader.

SHOCKLEY-KOMP

Marriage Ceremony Performed at Congregational Church, Thursday, July 22

Thursday afternoon, July 22, W. A. Shockley of Menominee and Miss Emma Louise Komp of Marinette, Wisconsin, were married in the Congregational church at 3 o'clock. Rev. C. E. Taggart pronounced the words that united the young couple.

The church was prettily decorated with pink and sweet peas, amaranth and ferns. Preceding the ceremony, Mrs. W. B. Saville of Petoskey sang "I Love You Truly."

The bride and groom entered by the right and left aisles to the strains of Lohengrin's wedding march, played by Mrs. Edna Martin of Indianapolis. Mrs. Martin also played very softly, during the impressive ring ceremony, "Believe Me If All Those Endearing Young Charms."

Following the service at the church, a reception was held at the home of the groom's mother, Mrs. Ada M. Shockley, and a five-course luncheon was served to 25 guests. The bride received many beautiful gifts.

Mrs. Shockley is one of Marinette's well known young ladies, and Mr. Shockley is credit manager of the Northern Hardware and Supply Co. of Menominee, where they will make their future home.

NOT A LOAFING PLACE

City Officials to Keep Gang Out of Mineral Well Pavilion

The common council took action at its regular meeting Monday evening on a matter that for some time has been uppermost in the minds of the citizens of Charlevoix.

Practically ever since the pavilion at the mineral spring was built, it has been used as a loafing place.

People going to the springs for a drink were oftentimes compelled to crowd to the fountain on account of a gang of loafers loitering in the enclosure. Signs have been posted and the police instructed to keep the place clear, but the minute their vigilance relaxed, the place filled up. Old men, young men and boys, chewing tobacco and smoking pipes and cigarettes, at times filled the place so that people were unable to use the pavilion for what it was intended.

Loafer rails will be placed on the walls at once, and the usual gang will find trouble in utilizing the pavilion for a loafing place in the future. People desiring a drink of water can obtain it without being the subject of coarse remarks and jests by a gang of loafers. The action of the council will be appreciated, by not only the citizens of Charlevoix, but our summer visitors as well.

DEATH CALLS ANOTHER

Mrs. Cora M. Bush of Susan Lake Died at Petoskey Last Tuesday Afternoon.

Mrs. Cora M. Bush, wife of D. T. Bush, of Susan Lake, died at Petoskey last Tuesday afternoon where she had undergone an operation some time ago in hope that her life might be saved.

Mrs. Bush was well known in Charlevoix and vicinity having resided on a large farm near this city the past 3 years. Mr. and Mrs. Bush resided in Petoskey for a number of years and her many friends from that place deeply mourn their loss. The funeral services were held from Henika's chapel at Petoskey last Friday morning at 11:00 o'clock, Rev. Quinton Walker officiating.

CHARLEVOIX GETS NEXT CONVENTION

Michigan Association of Rural Carriers Will Come to this City Next Year.

F. A. Butler, Carrier No. 1 of Charlevoix Landed Meeting After Hard Work.

A spirited fight for the honor of entertaining the next convention of the Michigan Association of Rural Carriers was staged at Holland Michigan, last Wednesday. Charlevoix won out in the finale by a vote of 63 to 19. Thus our city "The Beautiful" will have an opportunity to open wide its arms of hospitality for the benefit of the entertainment of this large body of men. The association has never been north and as this is the first visit, it should be the earnest desire of every person in Charlevoix to assist in the provision of some good entertainment for the visitors next summer.

The hard work of H. C. Raadall linked with the untiring and unceasing efforts of F. A. Butler, Rural Carrier No. 1 of this city were successful in bringing the convention to this city. Many good speakers will be present next year and the convention will probably bring to this city about 300 men, who ably assist the farming communities with their mail every day in the year.

Republican Rally.

Harry Coykendall of East Jordan and other prominent members of the Charlevoix County Republican Club were busily engaged in Boyne City last week making arrangements for the annual club banquet and big county rally. The citizens of Boyne City will entertain the representatives of the Grand Old Party at the Wolverine Hotel. The date will be announced later, with full account of program.

Forty-first Annual State Convention of W. C. T. U.

Report of Meeting Prepared By Local Delegate, Mrs. S. J. Alcox—Printed By Request.

The 41st annual state convention of Woman's Christian Temperance Union held at the Soo, was opened at 2 o'clock Wednesday afternoon, June 23, by singing the Crusade Hymn, reading the Crusade Psalm and with prayer and remarks by Mrs. Norma Mudge, president of the 8th district. The corresponding secretary called the roll of officers and superintendents to which all responded with a favorite quotation. All officers were present except Mrs. Benjamin, the honorary president, who was not able to attend on account of ill health, and Mrs. Mary B. Dickie, president of the third.

The State President, in his opening remarks said this was the first time in forty years that the convention has been held above the straits. Speaking of the campaign now on for state wide prohibition, he said: "We are now facing the most critical time in our history." The report of the convention was for state wide prohibition and every plan and all our work this year should be directed for that issue. She made special mention of the decorations which were very elaborate and very artistic. The Soo women hired a professional decorator to do the work. The decorations consisted of flags, banners, white bunting, palms, ferns and cut flowers. The meetings were held in the central M. E. church and the meals were served in the Presbyterian Church, the price was 35c for dinners and 25c for supper.

The superintendents were then called to the platform and given 7 minutes each. Mrs. Rich spoke on the young people's branch. She urged that special attention be given the Y. P. B. in April next and that we enlist the interest of our people in the coming state wide campaign. Mrs. Holcomb, Superintendent of L. T. L. said there were only 40 legions in the whole state, eighteen of these being new this year. Holland has eight legions with 200 pledged members. Recently those children marched through the streets and it was a most impressive sight to see them with their mottoes and banners. She urged the organizing of an L. T. L. in every union and said "Pay your Superintendent if needs be." Mrs. Linder, superintendent of work among foreigners reported 150,000 foreigners in Detroit alone, the majority are Catholics. She holds a mother's meeting every month with the mothers and stated they were very anxious to read the bible and to learn. Their children, if asked what they are, will invariably say they are Americans. She said there is a great opportunity to do missionary work right here at our doors!

At this time a telegram was received from Senator Straight, who was on the program for an address Friday evening, saying that owing to the sickness of his wife it would be impossible for him to come. An invitation was extended to the delegates to take an auto ride the next afternoon, a treat furnished by the Sault Ste Marie civic and commercial club.

Announcement was made that all who wished their pictures taken should meet at the church at one o'clock the following day.

At 4:15 the memorial service was led by Mrs. Sibley, who read a text of scripture, "Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord, etc., blessed from henceforth, now and forever."

The state president and several others paid tribute to the memory of Mrs. Jennie Voorheis, for many years state vice-president and superintendent of schools savings banks.

Only a month before her home going she gave up the presidency of the union which she had held for 29 years. She said she was reminded of Mary T. Lathrop's poem, "Beautiful toiler thy work all done; Beautiful soul into glory gone; Beautiful life with its crown now won, God giveth thee rest." "It was so sudden our white lips said, How we shall miss her, the beautiful dead; Who'll take the place of the precious one fled? But God knoweth best."

Mrs. Parish in her remarks said when a great soul goes home I am always reminded of the beautiful legend; When Moses climbed the mountain he beheld

INTERESTING INFORMATION

Facts About Our Own Navy That All Americans Should Know.

The policy of Secretary of the Navy Daniels in extending every possible courtesy and facility to film the U. S. Navy of 1915, was to stimulate the interest of the American public by demonstrating to them, in one imposing object lesson, just what the country has to show for the millions upon millions of dollars which are being expended annually for the navy. No more effective way of doing this could be conceived. Although statistics, tabular comparisons and descriptive articles cannot possibly give any adequate idea of our new navy and its activities as presented in the exclusive film production, a few figures nevertheless are interesting in this connection; and especially at this juncture in the world's history when it is so evident that the importance of a nation's navy cannot be over-estimated. So here are a few notable facts.

The ten newly perfected guns of the 14 inch type on the super-dreadnaught New York are so mounted that all can be used as a single broadside to either port or starboard. Each of them fires a projectile weighing 1400 lbs.—meaning a broadside of 14,000 lbs. from the 10 guns, to fire which costs the U. S. Government $7,770 per broadside. This involves the explosion of 3,700 lbs. of smokeless powder costing 53c per lb. or $1,961 per broadside for powder alone. In addition there is a secondary battery of twenty 5 inch guns and half of these can be fired simultaneously as a broadside. Four of these ships are able to fire a "salvo" of 14-inch guns, the combined weight of the projectiles weighing 56,000 lbs. or over 25 tons, which costs $31,080 to fire; and if the secondary batteries are included—if all guns on four ships were discharged at the same moment—the rain of steel would weigh 60,256 lbs. costing $34,256. For two of these ships the government paid $7,800,000 each exclusive of armor and armament, and to build the Atlantic fleet as constituted to-day cost over $150,000,000.

Congress appropriated last year for our new navy $139,964,333 of which $43,338,044 is for the construction of three new dreadnaughts. Since you, as a good American citizen, pay your share, this reproduction is of vital interest because it sets forth so clearly and tangibly how this vast appropriation is invested. The above film will be shown at the Majestic Theatre Friday, August 13, by the Lyman Howe motion picture company.

SHOOTS HIMSELF WHILE DESPONDENT

Joseph R. Empey of East Jordan Commits Suicide.

Continual Worry Over Poor Health Thought to Be the Cause of Rash Act.

East Jordan was shocked early Sunday morning when it became known that Joseph R. Empey, one of its well known citizens, had taken his own life by shooting himself through the head.

Mr. Empey had been in ill health for some time, and had been informed that no medical relief could be given him. He had been down town on Thursday previous to his death and visited with his friends, all of whom endeavored to cheer him up. At this time it is said he was quite despondent and discouraged, and made the statement that his troubles would soon be over.

He arose Sunday morning about five o'clock and was about the house some time, later going to his room. About seven o'clock the report of a revolver shot was heard, and upon investigation he was found lying in his room dead. The deed was evidently premeditated, as he placed the revolver at the root of his left ear, where the bullet would sever the jugular vein. Death must have been instantaneous, as the bullet crashed through the jugular vein and lodged in his brain.

Mr. Empey had been a resident of East Jordan for about twelve or more years, coming there from New York state. In partnership with his brother, he conducted a furniture store, taking an active part in the business until about a year ago. He had been in poor health for some time, and it is thought the worry over his condition was the cause of his taking his own life.

Funeral services were held Tuesday, under the auspices of the Christian Science church, and the remains will be taken to his former home in New York for interment.

MILFORD APPOINTED

Former Commissioner of Schools Honored With Plum Which Opens Larger Field.

Ex-school Commissioner J. H. Milford of East Jordan is now enjoying the distinction of being a Deputy Game Warden and Forestry Warden, having received the announcement of this appointment by State Game Oates last week. Mr. Milford has already entered upon his duties which open a larger field for his unquestionable ability and which carries larger financial appreciation. He will assume the greater responsibilities of the office the first of September. At that time he will take up the educational phase of the conservation work, giving schools of instruction.

His work will be of the constructive nature, that of teaching fire prevention rather than fire fighting and teaching the reasonableness of the game laws and their necessity. No man is more entitled to the appointment and more fitted for the work. He is naturally a constructive builder and his association with the schools will add to his value to this department.

Such Proof as This Should Convince Any Charlevoix Citizen.

The public endorsement of a local citizen is the best proof that can be produced. None better, none stronger can be had. When a man comes forward and testifies to his fellow-citizens, addresses his friends and neighbors, you may be sure he is thoroughly convinced or he would not do so. Telling one's experience when it is for the public good is an act of kindness that should be appreciated. The following statement given by a resident of Charlevoix adds one more to the many cases of Home Endorsement which are being published about Doan's Kidney Pills. Read it.

Henry Newman, 203 Sheridan St., Charlevoix, says: "I have been troubled for years by my kidneys. I was annoyed by annoying by too frequent passages of the kidney secretions at night and I also had backache. I read of Doan's Kidney Pills and got a box at the Ivy Drug Store. GOT THE TRAIN STOPPED.

Attempts Were Dismal Failures, but the Third Won.

When the late Robert Bonner purchased land on the shore to Charter Oak park to be built. One day a friend of Mr. Bonner left New York to visit him at the park, but found the train did not stop at that station. The conductor was polite, but said that he could not go against orders.

At New Haven a halt was made and Mr. Bonner's friend tried to bribe the engineer with a ten dollar bill, but in vain. He was then told that Charles F. Clark, the president of the road, was on the train, and he went to him and politely requested that the stop be made.

"Why don't you see the conductor?" asked Mr. Clark.
"I have, but he will not disobey orders."

"Why not then go forward and bribe the engineer?"
"I tried bribery at New Haven, but it would not work."

The absence of evasion was the best policy. Mr. Clark not only gave orders to have the train stopped at Charter Oak, but promised some day to see Maud S. He had witnessed the attempt at bribery, and the frank confession of the offense seemed to please him.

BIG NAVAL GUNS.

Death at Times Comes From Merely Serving Them in Battle.

Modern naval engagements demonstrate that the gunners sometimes die after the battle, even when they have not been wounded or injured in any way. Death is caused by disturbance of the circulation due to the strain placed upon the nervous system by the excitement and the tremendous vibrations of modern guns.

Curiously enough, this collapse is quite as likely to affect the most robust members of the gun crew as the ones with poorer physique and bears no relation to the individual's courage. It is due to a lack of sufficient reserve power of the heart, which is dependent upon the quality of the heart muscles, and there is no known means of estimating this inherent quality exactly.

It is possible, of course, to determine the force and strength of the heart in an individual, but only some test, such as that of actual battle, will determine the quality of the heart muscles.

Thus the veteran gunner who has proved his heart quality in actual battle has become a peculiarly valuable factor in modern naval warfare.—Los Angeles Times.

Spanish Surnames.

In addition to three or four Christian names the Spanish child bears the combined family names of his father and mother. When the surnames are doubled or connected by the y, meaning "and," the first is the more important one and the only one that may be taken alone, for it is in the father's name, while the last is in the name of the mother. In Spain they know no "senior" and "junior." Father and son may bear the same Christian name, but each takes his own mother's name as a distinction, the father being, for instance, Pedro Diaz y Castillo and the son Pedro Diaz y Blanco.

GEORGE'S BAD SPELL.

Washington Never Could Learn to Write Some Words Correctly.

Whoever heard that the great George Washington never could learn to spell correctly?

You see, it happened this way. When George was quite a young boy he came across a copy of an English book called the "Young Man's Companion," written in a "plain and easy style," as the title stated, which taught one how to write letters, words, deeds, to survey, to navigate, to build houses, to make ink and elder, how to doctor the sick and how to conduct oneself in society, "all without the aid of a tutor."

Washington studied this book from cover to cover and from it acquired two qualities that clung to him through life. His handwriting, easy, flowing and legible, was modeled from the engraved "copy" sheet, and certain forms of spelling were learned that he never could correct.

To the end of his life Washington wrote lie, lye; liar, lyar; ceiling, cleiling; oil, oyl, and blew, as in his boyhood he had learned to do from this old book. Struggle as he did in trying to spell as the others of his day did, he never could be sure of certain words.—St. Louis Republic.

SYNOPSIS.

Frank O'Connell, young Irish patriot, is shot and wounded by British soldiers while making a "home rule" speech. He is aided by Angela Kingsnorth, an English society girl, who defends him.

Angela takes O'Connell to her brother's home and helps to nurse him. He recovers, and he and the girl become fast friends. O'Connell when well is sent to jail for disturbing the peace. He finally writes Angela that he has finished his sentence.

CHAPTER VI.

A House of Cards.

KINGSNORTH sank into a chair. The letter slipped from his fingers. All his dreams had vanished in a moment. His house of cards had toppled down. His ambitions were surely and positively destroyed at one stroke. He mechanically picked up the letter and read it. Had it been his death sentence it could not have affected him more cruelly.

Dear Nathaniel—I scarcely know how to write to you about what has happened. I am afraid I am in some small measure to blame. Ten days ago your sister showed me a letter from a man named O'Connell.

Kingsnorth crushed the letter in his hand as he read the hated name—the name of the man who had caused him so much discomfort during that unfortunate visit to his estate in Ireland. How he blamed himself now for having ever gone there! There was indeed a curse on it for the Kingsnorths.

He straightened out the crumpled piece of paper and read on——a man named O'Connell—the man she nursed in your house in Ireland after he had been shot by the soldiers. He was coming to England and wished to see her. She asked my permission. I reasoned with her, but she was decided. If I should not permit her to see him in my house she would meet him elsewhere. It seemed better the meeting should be under my roof, so I consented. I bitterly reproach myself now for not acquainting you with the particulars. You might have succeeded in stopping what has happened.

Your sister and O'Connell were married this morning by special license and left this afternoon for Liverpool en route to America.

I cannot begin to tell you how much I deplore the unfortunate affair. It will always be a lasting sorrow to me. I cannot write any more now. My head is aching with the thought of what it will mean to you. Try not to think too hard of me and believe me, always your affectionate cousin,

MARY CAROLINE WREXFORD.

Kingsnorth's head sank on to his breast. Every bit of life left him, everything about his feet aches, the laughingstock of his friends.

Were Angela there at that moment he could have killed her.

The humiliation of it! The degradation of it! Married to that lawless Irish agitator! The man now a member of his family! A cry of misery broke from him as he realized that the best years of his life were to come and go fruitlessly. His career was ended. Despair lay heavy on his soul.

Standing on the main deck of an Atlantic liner stood Angela and O'Connell.

They were facing the future together. Their faces were turned to the west. The sun was sinking in a blaze of color.

Their eyes lighted up with the joy of hope.

"Love was in their hearts."

A year after the events in the preceding chapter took place O'Connell and his young wife were living in a small apartment in one of the poorer sections of New York city.

The first few months in America had been glorious ones for them. Their characters and natures unfolded to each other as some wonderful paintings, each taking its own hues from the admiration of the other.

In company with a noted Irish orator O'Connell had spoken in many of the big cities of the United States and was everywhere hailed as a hero and a martyr to English tyranny.

But he had one ever present handicap—a drawback he had never felt during the years of struggle preceding his marriage. His means were indeed small. He tried to eke out a little income writing articles for the newspapers and magazines. But the recompense was pitiful. He could not bear without a pang to see Angela in the dingy surroundings that he could barely afford to provide for her.

On her part Angela took nothing with her but a few jewels her mother had left her, some clothes and very little money. The money soon disappeared, and then one by one the keepers of her mother were parted with but they never lost heart. Through it all they were happy. All the poetry of O'Connell's nature came uppermost, leavened, as it was, by the deep faith and veneration of his wife.

This strangely assorted fervent man and gentle woman seemed to have solved the great mystery of happiness between two people.

But the poverty chafed O'Connell—not for himself, but for the frail, loving, uncomplaining woman who had given her life into his care.

His active brain was continually trying to devise new ways of adding to his meager income. He multiplied his duties. He worked far into the night when he could find a demand for his articles. But little by little his sources of revenue failed him.

Some fresh and horrible agrarian cruelties in Ireland, for which the home rule party was blamed, for a while turned the tide of sympathy against his party. The order was sent out to discontinue meetings for the purpose of collecting funds in America—funds the Irish Americans had been so cheerfully and plentifully bestowing on the "cause."

O'Connell was recalled to Ireland. His work was highly commended. Some day they would send him to the United States again as a special pleader. At present he would be of greater value at home.

He was instructed to apply to the treasurer of the fund and arrangements would be made for his passage back to Ireland.

He brought the news to Angela with a strange feeling of fear and disappointment. He had built so much on making a wonderful career in the great new world and returning home some day to Ireland with the means of relieving some of her misery and with his wife guarded, as she should be, from the possibility of want. And here was he going back to Ireland as poor as he left it, though richer immeasurably in the love of Angela.

She was sitting perfectly still, her eyes on the floor, when he entered the room. He came in so softly that she did not hear him. He lifted her hand and looked into her eyes. He noticed with certainty what had been so far only a vague, ill defined dread. Her face was very, very pale and transparent. Her eyes were sunken and had a strange brilliancy. She was much slighter and far more ethereal than on that day when they stood on the deck of the ship and turned their faces so hopefully to the new world.

He felt a knife-like stab startle through his blood to his heart. His breath caught.

Angela looked up at him radiantly. He kissed her and with mock cheerfulness he said laughingly:

"Such news, my darling! Such wonderful news!"

"Good news, dear?"

"The best in the world," and he choked a sob.

"I know it would come! I knew it would. Tell me, dear."

"We're to go back—back to Ireland. See, here are the orders," and he showed her the official letter.

She took it wonderingly and read it. Her hand dropped to her side. Her head drooped into the same position he had found her in. In a moment he was kneeling at her side.

"What is it, dear?"

"We can't go, Frank."

"We can't go? What are ye sayin', dear?"

"We can't go," she repeated, her body crumpled apologetically in the chair.

"And why not, Angela? I know I can't take ye back as I brought ye here, dear, if that's what ye mean. The luck's been against me. It's been cruel hard against me. An' that though is tantamount to me heart's complaint."

"It isn't that, Frank," she said faintly.

"Then what is it?"

"Oh," she cried, "I hoped it would be so different—so very different."

"What did ye think would be so different, dear? Our going back? Is that what's troubling ye?"

"No, Frank, not that. I don't care how we go back so long as you are with me." He pressed her hand. In a moment she went on: "But we can't go, we can't go. Oh, my dear, my dear, can't you guess? Can't you think?"

She looked imploringly into his eyes. A new wonder came into his. Could it be true? Could it? He took both her hands and held them tightly and stood up, towering over her and trembling violently.

"Is it—Is it?" he cried and stopped as if afraid to complete the question.

She smiled a wan smile up at him and nodded her head as she answered: "The union of our lives is to be complete. Our love is to be rewarded."

"A child is coming to us?" he whispered.

"It is," and her voice was hushed too.

"Praise be to God! Praise be to his holy name!" And O'Connell clasped his hands in prayer.

In a little while she went on: "It was the telling you I wanted to be so different. I wanted you when you heard it to be free of care—happy. And I've waited from day to day, hoping for the best—that some good fortune would come to you."

He forced one of his old-time, hearty laughs, but there was a hollow ring in it.

"What is that yer sayin' at all? Wait for good fortune? Is there any good fortune like what ye've just told me? Sure I'm ten times the happiest man since I came into this room." He put his arm around her and, sitting beside her, drew her closely to him.

"Listen, dear," he said, "listen. We'll go back to the old country. Our child shall be born where we first met. There'll be no danger. No one shall harm us with that little life trembling in the balance—the little precious life."

If it's a girl child she'll be the mother of her people, and if it be a man child he shall grow up to carry on his father's work. So there—there, me darlin', we'll go back—we'll go back."

She shook her head feebly. "I can't," she said.

"Why not, dear?"

"I didn't want to tell you, but now you make me. Frank, dear, I am ill."

His heart almost stopped. "Ill? Oh, my darling, what is it? Is it serious? Tell me it isn't serious!" And his voice rang with a note of agony.

"Oh, no, I don't think so. I saw the doctor today. He said I must be careful, very careful, until—until our baby is born."

"An' ye kept it all to yerself, me brave one, me dear one. All right. We won't go back. We'll stay here. I'll make them find me work. I'm strong. I'm clever, too, and crafty. Angela, I'll wring it from this bustling city. I'll fight it and beat it. Me darlin', shall have everything she wants. My little mother—my precious little mother!"

CHAPTER VII.

A Communication From Nathaniel Kingsnorth.

THE months that followed were the hardest in O'Connell's life. Strive as he would, he could find no really remunerative employment. He had no special training. He knew no trade. His pen, though fluent, was not cultured and lacked the glow of eloquence he had when speaking. He worked in shops and in factories. He tried to report on newspapers. But his lack of experience everywhere handicapped him. What he contrived to earn during those months of struggle was all too little as the time approached for the great event.

Angela was now entirely confined to her bed. She seemed to grow more spirit-like every day. A terrible dread haunted O'Connell waking and sleeping. He would start out of some terrible dream at night and listen to her breathing. When he would hurry back at the close of some long, disappointing day his heart would be hammering dully with fear for his loved one.

As the months wore on his face became lined with care and the bright gold of his hair dimmed with streaks of silver. But he never faltered or lost courage. He always felt he must win the fight for existence as he meant to win the greater conflict later—for liberty.

Angela, lying so still, through the long days, could only hope. She felt so helpless. It was woman's weakness that brought men like O'Connell to the edge of despair. And hers was not merely bodily weakness, but the more poignant one of pride. Was it fair to her husband. Was it just? In England she had prospered relatives. They would not let her die in her misery. They could not let her baby come into the world with poverty as its only inheritance. Till now she had been unable to master her feelings of hatred and bitterness for her brother Nathaniel, her intense dislike and contempt for her sister Monica. From the time she left England she had not written to either of them. Could she now? Something decided her.

One night O'Connell came back disheartened. Try as he would, he could not conceal it. He was getting to the end of his courage. There was insupportable work at the shop he had been working in for several weeks. He had been told he need not come again.

Angela, lying motionless and white, tried to comfort him and give him heart.

She made up her mind that night. The next day she wrote to her brother. She could not bring herself to express one regret for what she had done or said. On the contrary, she made many references to her happiness with the man she loved. She did write of the hardships they were passing through. But they were only temporary. O'Connell was so clever, so brilliant, he must win in the end. Only just now she was ill. She needed help. She asked no gift—a loan merely. They would pay it back when the days of plenty came. She would not ask even this were it not that she was not only ill, but the one great, wonderful thing in the world was to be touch-safed her—motherhood. In the name of her unborn baby she begged him to send an immediate response.

She asked a neighbor to post the letter so that O'Connell would not know of her affliction. She waited anxiously for a reply.

Some considerable time afterward—on the eve of her travail and when things with O'Connell were at their worst—the answer came by cable.

She was alone when it came. Her heart beat furiously as she opened it. Even if he only sent a little it would be so welcome now when they were almost at the end. If he had been generous how wonderful it would be for her to help the man to whom nothing was too much to give her. The fact that her brother had enabled strengthened the belief that he had hastened to come to her rescue.

She opened the cable and read it. Then she fell back on the pillow with a low, faint moan.

When, hours later, O'Connell returned from a vain search for work he found her senseless with the cable in her fingers. He tried to revive her without success. He sent a neighbor for a doctor. As he watched the worn, patient face his heart full of hurting, the thought flashed through him what could have happened to cause this collapse. He became conscious of the cable he held and that it bore a message to her.

STREAKED WALLS.

Cold Surfaces Always Catch More Dust
 Than Hot Ones.

The reason that lath and plaster walls become streaked is explained by John Altken, in Nature, as due to the tendency of hot air to deposit its dust on cold surfaces, and the colder the surface the weaker the power of resistance. So where the laths protect the plaster from the cold outside the plaster receives less deposit of dust than where it is between the laths.

Wherever a hot steam or water pipe comes through a wall a vertical streak of dust may be seen above it, due to the hot air driving the dust against the cold wall. Rooms that are heated by open grates are much less dusty than those heated by radiators because in the former the furniture is heated principally by radiation, and, being warmer than the air, it repels the particles of dust instead of catching them, while in the latter the air heats the furniture and in so doing deposits its dust on it.

Rooms lighted by electricity keep clean longer than those heated by gas simply because the light is almost cold.
 Mr. Altken sums it up as follows:
 "Any surface hotter than the air keeps free from dust."

Swallowed and Climbed.

A woman newly rich was invited to an aristocratic dinner party. During the course of fowl and salad this woman noticed with dismay a fat, furry caterpillar on her topmost leaf of lettuce. Glancing up, she met her aristocratic hostess' eye. The hostess, too, had seen the caterpillar. "Her gaze implored the guest to save the dinner from catastrophe. The guest gave her hostess a reassuring smile. Then she doubled a lettuce leaf around the caterpillar and swallowed it calmly. The look of awe and gratitude that her hostess gave her was an assurance that her footing in society was at last firmly established.

"Did you think," said Mrs. Newly-rich to her daughter afterward, "that I'd lose a chance of establishing the family socially for a little thing like a caterpillar?"

Where Shell Bracelets Came From.

Though Duca has lost its trade in fine muslins, it is still the chief center of the manufacture of the shell bracelets everywhere worn among the Hindus. These are cut by women, using a very primitive saw, from what is popularly known as the chank shell of the East Indian seas, and into the suik portion of the design colored lac is melted. Except the rare specimens with reversed opening, which have fetched as much as £70, chanks are not costly. But the shell is sacred to Vishnu, and the bangles and anklets made from it are frequently left on the body at burial. Thus these shanks are not entirely subject to fluctuations of taste, and the demand for their remains steady.—London Chronicle.

THEATRICAL

He Succeeded.

The 130 ton gun in the 12 inch turret was ready to hurl an 850 pound shell ten miles and even at that distance put it through 9 inch armor plate.

The adventurous photographer stationed so near it was sorry now that he came. He was about to receive a shock —that much he knew. He knew, too, that he would experience a new sensation, and one that in all probability would be as new to him as he could not imagine it. He became nervous, but there was no escape now. Moreover he told himself he was not a "quitter." So his professional self got the mastery.

Although he had braced his camera well he forgot to brace himself, and after it was all over the gun crew had to pick him up a rather crippled photographer. After two weeks in the hospital he recovered sufficiently well to tell what little he remembered, but he could not tell it nearly as well as the pictures he secured for Lyman H. Howe, which will be shown in Charlevoix on August 13.

The romance of industry as expressed in the making of a national cash register constitutes another feature of the program. Howe selected this particular plant not alone because it is typical of American skill, enterprise and organization but because it is recognized the world over as the model manufacturing plant—a monumental realization of an ideal. The variety of the scenes may be imagined when it is remembered that 90 trades and professions are engaged here in manufacturing machines from 8,600 different kinds of raw material coming from all quarters of the globe.
 The registers are shipped to 75 different countries and protect 33 different coinages of money.

The Philippines of to-day and yesterday—the past and present customs, costumes, dances, habits, etc., of a strange people—forms another noteworthy subject of vital and absorbing interest, besides many other features of rare charm and beauty, not to mention entirely new animated cartoons which always form such a welcome and pleasant diversion. At the Majestic, Friday,

When Poland Drank Hard.

Poland was a great country for hard drinking in the old days. Its last king, Stanislaus II., was solemnly warned by the grand hetman, Branicki, that he must never expect to become popular unless he got drunk at least twice a week. Pan Kemarzewski, who could empty a bucketful of champagne at a draft without noticeable consequences, once in company with Pan Sosiejew-ski, high chamberlain of Volhynia, disposed of a whole butt of old Hungarian wine at a single sitting. One held his breker under the hunchole until it was full and then drank while the other filled his breker, and so, turn and turn about, they achieved the feat.—

AMONG THE PLAYERS

And Caddies

Ed Krulick has deserted the caddie ranks and gone to work at the lime kilns.

We regret very much the omission of our squibs last week. Our only excuse is that Wednesday came too quick.

Harold Beyers took Yettows Hyck's place as professionals' caddie after the latter's injury last week. Carl Gordon has the position this week.

The new rule cards have appeared at last. It is the duty of every caddie to know what is printed in them, and always to have one in his pocket for reference to the golf rules.

Monday, July 26, was probably the busiest day in the history of the course.
 There were 222 starters and the caddie earnings amounted to $115.30. That would buy a whole lot of things.

There are evidently lots of boys who are enrolled who are not reporting for work these busy days. The month of August will be a record breaker. We need boys, particularly in the forenoon.

The date for the second annual caddie excursion has been set, Sunday, August 15. We regret that the work compels us to go on Sunday. The City of Boyne has been chartered for the day.

Hugh Kelly reported for duty again Monday morning. A broken wrist is not near enough to keep a good fellow down long, especially when he has such a good Italian name. Kelly is thankful, for he says, if he broke his wrist just practising for the roller-skate race, think what he might have done in the real race!

The attention of the caddies is called to the fact that some of the holes on the greens show rough and careless treatment. Take all possible care in handling the flags and in flagging the holes. Those holes cost money, and having them in good condition costs money to the caddies in the long run.
 Get the connection?

For the last few days our good friend
 Mr. Block, has been rolling up about noon with a Ford full of ice cream and cones, milk, cinnamon rolls, etc. His object in coming is very evident. A cone tastes very good after an eighteen-hole tour. But remember, boys, you can't buy very many cones without spoiling the price of a shirt. Be moderate.

It will interest many and doubtless surprise a few of the good people to know that during the month ending Wednesday, July 21, the caddies received the considerable sum of $1278.52. This statistic is not approximated, but is gained from the caddie-master's record of the amount paid for each engagement. The same record shows that there were 2511 starters from the first tee during the month.

On the morning of Tuesday, July 21,
 Yettows Hyck, the professional's caddie for that week, was struck on the top of the head by an iron club in the hands of one taking a lesson. While teeing up the practice balls he got too near where the pupil was practising strokes and connected with one of them. No blame can be placed on either caddie or player. Dr. Armstrong took a couple of stitches in the gash, and Yettows remained off the links until Monday morning of this week.

The bringing of cards to the golf links, the playing of any game for money and smoking while at the links.

A crank is an idealist blown up. He has been guilty of intellectual intemperance. He is a spiritual dope fiend who has indulged himself in the licentiousness of uncontrolled logic until he has the delirium tremens. And just as among alcoholics it is generally true that only one who is afflicted with an inner itching and abnormality to begin with can so shrink his personality as to let one appetite eat him up so it is only the naturally twisted mind that becomes a fanatic. The fanatic's idea has built up a perverted, little, imaginary world all its own; it matters nothing to him that his act is out of all reasonable connection with the world of real affairs.

HUNNING AN INCUBATOR.

Cooling and Turning the Eggs Should Be Regularly Performed.

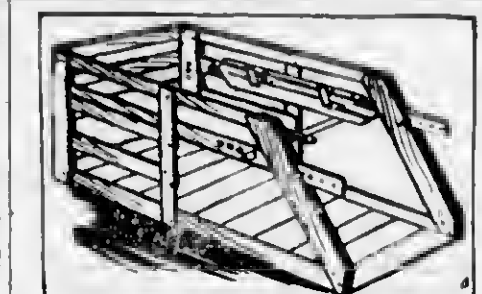

Cooling and turning the eggs in the incubator is a part of the work that must be attended to promptly, regularly, writes W. C. Thompson in the Country Gentleman. The mother hen turns her eggs in the nest each day and leaves them to cool at about the same time each day if she has her way about it. After the third day of the hatch the eggs should be turned regularly each morning and evening. This may be done by removing a few and gently rolling the others about in the tray. The idea is to change the position of the developing germ within the shell and keep it free from the shell. Changing the position of the eggs on the tray is also of advantage, as there may be a slight variation of temperature in different parts of the egg chamber.

The eggs should be cooled once a day. Start on the third day, when the eggs are first turned. It is necessary to cool them only the length of time that it takes to turn them. From the third day to the nineteenth day they should be cooled regularly. As the chicks develop, they may be cooled longer each day until during the latter part of the hatch they may be cooled for almost an hour without any injury and with great benefit.

On the nineteenth day the chamber should be closed, to remain closed until the chicks are hatched. On the fifteenth, seventeenth and nineteenth days the eggs should be sprayed with warm water to furnish sufficient moisture to aid the chicks in pecking their way through the shell. If a sand tray is in the machine this spraying is unnecessary. The flame should be turned down slightly during these last two days, as an increased temperature results from the animal heat in the chicks' bodies. The chamber should be darkened if there is a glass front in the machine. This will tend to prevent the chicks from forcing their way toward the front of the machine. They are supposed to sleep for twelve hours after coming from the shell. If the chamber is light they will not do this.

Hog Breeding Crates.

The method of construction of the crate for breeding swine is shown plainly in the accompanying illustration, says National Stockman. The inner arrangement is the part hard to understand. The long pieces with the holes in them (see cut) can be raised up or let down as required by the height of sow, using the gas pipe for the back end and an iron rod for the front. If the height cannot be properly estimated before the sow is driven in it can be quickly changed afterward. The shelves on each side of the sow for the fore feet of the boar can rest at the ends of gas pipe and rod. In most cases the shelf on one side can be made stationary or the other made in two parts so it can be widened or made narrow. These can rest on the rods at the ends and can be put in place in a moment after the sow is O'Connell's Big Head. Thackeray was six feet two inches in height, and Sir H. W. Lucy says the great novelist wore a seven and five-eighths inch hat, beating Dickens and John Bright by a full half inch. Mr. Gladstone's hat was of seven and three-eighths inch measurement—the same as Macaulay's—while Beaconsfield needed a full seven inch. The hat of Daniel O'Connell, however, would have beaten them all, measuring eight and one-half inches by ten inches.

Care of the Breed Sow.

The quality of your spring crop of pigs will be determined by the kind of care you are now giving your brood sows. Don't keep them on dry feed. They need milky little corn, but lots of muckage. Alfalfa or even clover hay will be relished. Mangels or other roots could not have a better use. With this kind of feed the sows will have plenty of milk and they will not eat their pigs.

Build Up the Farm.

If you are living on a poor farm—that is, if the land is poor—the chances are it is your own fault. There is some land, but not very much, that can't be improved. By keeping the right kind of stock and by building up the soil through rotating the crops you are pretty sure to improve conditions on the home acres.

Cold Settled In His Back

"Foley Kidney Pills always give me prompt relief."—Ed Nelson, Rogers, Neb.
Ed Nelson, of Rogers, Neb., writes: "I have used Foley Kidney Pills for backache, the result of catching cold which settled in my back. Foley Kidney Pills always give me prompt relief and I can cheerfully recommend them."
The reason Foley Kidney Pills act so satisfactorily is because they neutralize and dissolve the poisonous waste matter that remains in the blood because the kidneys do not do their work properly in filtering and casting out from the system uric acid and other poisons.
Relief usually follows in a few days and such symptoms as pain in the sides or back, stiff joints, sore muscles, rheumatism, too frequent action of the bladder at night, and other painful and annoying ailments disappear. Foley Kidney Pills contain 17 harmful ingredients. They are safe as well as quick acting.

There is more Catarrh in this section of the country than all other diseases put together, and until the last few years was supposed to be incurable. For a great many years doctors pronounced it a local disease and prescribed local remedies, and by constantly tampering with cure with local treatment, pronounced it incurable. Science has proven Catarrh to be a constitutional disease, and therefore requires constitutional treatment. Hall's Catarrh Cure, manufactured by E. J. Cheney & Co., Toledo, Ohio, is the only Constitutional cure on the market. It is taken internally in doses from 10 drops to a teaspoonful. It acts directly on the blood and mucous surfaces of the system. They offer one hundred dollars, for any case it fails to cure. Send for literature and testimonials.

Temperance

(Conducted by the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union.)

HOW TO EDUCATE.

In the temperance education campaign now being vigorously carried on to all parts of the country a specialized system is advisable. Dr. Wells Andrews in Chicago Daily News, puts this suggestion into words that are well worth passing on.

Tell the lumber men of Michigan, be ays, how many thousands of drinking farmers will shingle their homes and barns or build new ones as soon as they "quit their meannesses." Tell the shoe manufacturer of Massachusetts what it means to take all the bare feet of drunkards' children off the ground. Tell the two men of Pennsylvania that new stoves will be needed in 100,000 homes when the saloon-keeper ceases to get the money, and tell the miners they will have work all winter through getting coal enough to put into those stoves. Tell the wool growers of Ohio that everybody in this country is going to be wrapped in woolen and sleep under blankets when the blizzards blow, and the men no longer hunt up with "liquid fire" in order to exterminate their families with atmospheric cold. Tell the cattle raisers in Chicago that there is going to be beef on thousands of tables, where now there are a few cold potatoes. Tell the grocer he can sell for cash and say good-by to bad debts when the dimes no longer go into the saloon till. Tell the farmers there is going to be an unheard of demand for flour and meal, butter, cheese and eggs as soon as beer drinkers cease fostering that industry and begin filling out the hollow cheeks of wives and children.

ALCOHOL, SHOT AND SHELL.

The Reformer, a paper of Western Australia, writes of the effects of intoxicating drinks in the expeditionary force of that state as follows:

A little time ago 20,000 troops were medically certified as sound in mind and limb. Then alcohol began to put in its time work, and in a short time 2,000 of them, either for behavior or sickness, were dismissed. Their places were soon filled, but neither the citizens nor the soldiers had learned their lesson, and so whisky or beer was still regarded as the bond of good-fellowship, and the test of hospitality. Then came along pneumonia, that dread daughter of alcoholism. It was pneumonia in the camp, pneumonia at Albany, pneumonia on the sea, and pneumonia beneath the shadow of the pyramids. Some tardily recovered, others were laid beneath the turf or the wave before ever they saw the flash of Turkish sword or heard the burst of German bomb.

Alcoholism and pneumonia indeed can scarcely be separated, and the foremost physicians of England now are saying that they look upon the previous alcoholic condition of a patient as the arbiter of his life when attacked by pneumonia. This first blood in our war was drawn, not by the bayonets of the enemy, but by the folly of ourselves. The foolish hospitality of the people and the drinking dens of the state joined hands in destroying our defenders.

A NEW FAITH.

Although Maj. Dan Morgan-Smith of Chicago was never personally addicted to the use of strong drink, yet he was for several years the able general counsel of the Model License league. He is now a zealous advocate of temperance, and thus writes: "Arguments that once seemed so plausible have failed me; for the foundation of my faith had the corner stone of my arguments was the failure of regulation and the success of prohibition. My faith is gone and my corner stone is displaced, my structure has fallen, and it remains for me to help build another, founded on a new faith, with a corner stone as enduring as the truth, and that faith shall be called Temperance, and the corner stone shall be Annihilation. I shall never make another speech in behalf of the Model License league. I am through with the wet side. My intelligence insists upon it; my conscience demands it."

FOR THE SAKE OF OUR BOYS.

A mother having expressed her regret at the lukewarmness of a certain preacher on the prohibition question, received the reply, "But, my dear woman, it is not necessary to urge it. It is right and is sure to come. It may be twenty or, perhaps, ten years, but what matters a few years?" "What matters a few years?" replied the mother with deep feeling. "If your boy or my boy are to be among those who will be ruined in the saloons in these ten or twenty years, it would seem a matter of infinite importance how soon the liquor traffic was exterminated."

LIKE-MINDED.

The Worth Brothers Steel Mills company, the Lukens Iron and Steel company of Coatsville, Pa., and the Florence Iron company of Florence, N. J., have prohibited the delivery of beer, whisky or any other intoxicating liquors to the homes of their employees, not all agents of breweries are prohibited from soliciting upon the premises.

Mr. and Mrs. Anson Kennedy and two children drove their car from Harbor Springs last Friday, and visited at the home of their cousin, Mrs. George Kelderhouse, returning Monday.

Dr. George W. King, wife and son, Donald, left Tuesday for Marquette, where they will visit relatives. Dr. King will return in a few days, while Mrs. King and Donald will make an extended visit.

The opening number of Chautauqua week was well attended, and words of praise were spoken for the fine entertainment. The management promises something above the ordinary both afternoon and evening during the entire week.

A large sturgeon was found floating in the slip at the Boyne City docks last week by some fishermen. It was dead when found and it is said to have measured seven feet in length. It was estimated the weight of the fish when alive would reach 125 pounds.

FEEDING YOUNG TURKEYS.

Wet Mash is Often Responsible For Bowel Trouble.

The first consideration in the successful raising of turkeys is to select good, strong, vigorous stock for parents, writes a correspondent of the Iowa Homestead. The earlier the stock the better. My choice at this time is the White Holland. I set one turkey hen on twenty-one eggs, and if there happen to be more eggs I set them under chicken hens at the same time. When they all hatch the poults are given to the mother turks.

I put them in a large, dry coop, in which there is dry chaff scattered from the horse mangers. After keeping them confined a short time I turn them out on the range. This is, of course, in the country. The poults are not fed until they are twenty-four hours old. Then I parch the shells from which they were hatched and feed them with rolled oats three times a day until they are about two weeks old. Feed dry mashes. Wet mashes are often responsible for the bowel trouble that causes such heavy losses. Crushed shells and grit are before both turkeys and chickens all the time.

About the 11th, I powder the hen when she is taken from the nest with her brood and continue to powder all of the flock once a week until they are about half grown. Choose some good louse powder. There are many of them.

The young toms average from twenty-four to twenty-seven pounds and the hens from twelve to fourteen pounds.

Start Slowly With Chickens.

Do not attempt to do too much the first year you go into the poultry business. Don't raise a lot of chicks and give them half hearted attention, but raise a few choice ones and give plenty of time to the work. You may want to start on a big scale, and with a great number of breeds, but if you will be a little conservative it will be for your own good later on.

Destroying Cattle Lice.

The first thing to do is to cleanse, disinfect, whitewash and perfectly light and ventilate the stable. Then wash affected cattle with a decoction of four ounces of stavesacre (darkspur) seeds to the gallon of boiling water. Repeat this application as often as necessary to eradicate the lice.

Barley as a Hog Feed.

Barley for pigs is not quite as good as corn for fattening purposes. But for growing animals, especially pigs, it heads the list of grains. It produces flesh of the finest quality. Barley hay does not possess a high feeding value.

DEATH TAKES THEIR SON

Home of Mr. and Mrs. Henry Howe Again Visited By Grim Reaper.

The home of Henry and Amelia Howe of Hayes township was again visited by the grim reaper, Sunday, this time taking from them their son Earl, whose death occurred just nine days after that of his sister, Beattie.

Earl Howe was 22 years of age, and died Sunday evening, July 25, at 7 o'clock. About seven years ago he suffered a stroke from which effects he never fully recovered. Some time ago complications set in and about a week ago he was forced to give up and was confined to his bed until death relieved him of his suffering. He is survived by his father and mother, three sisters and four brothers.

Funeral services were held from the home of his parents at 2:00 Sunday, Rev. Quinton Walker, officiating. Interment at Brookside cemetery. The bereaved family have the sincerest sympathy of the entire community.

VISITED MANITOU ISLAND

Local Odd Fellows Visit Captain Nels Palmer of Coast Guard Station.

Fourteen members of Round Lake Lodge, I. O. O. F. visited Manitou Island on Sunday last, the main object being to drop in on Nels Palmer, formerly of this city, now captain of the coast guard station on the island.

The party made the trip on the Arbutus, leaving Charlevoix Sunday morning between six and seven o'clock. The trip took about four hours, arriving at the island at 10 o'clock, where they received a hearty welcome by Captain Palmer, wife and members of the coast guard.

After a sight seeing trip about the island, an old fashioned picnic dinner was had. Captain Palmer was allotted the task of making the coffee, which in the opinion of the picnicers would be hard to beat. The return trip was made in the afternoon, the party reaching Charlevoix about six o'clock. It is needless to say a cordial invitation was extended to come again.

Attention Ben Hurs.

There will be a special meeting held at the home of Mrs. Ranger Wednesday evening, August 4. All officers and degree team are requested to be present.

ATTACKS YOUNG GIRL

Boyne Falls Scene of Outrageous Crime—Perpetrator Caught.

Grant Alexander, a "traveler" with no specified home, is awaiting sentence in the county jail for attacking a ten year old girl near Boyne Falls Saturday July 17. He forced the little girl to accompany him back into the underbrush beside the railroad track where she fought with superhuman strength, keeping the ruffian at bay until a coming train frightened him away. She was badly bruised and her clothing torn from her but escaped other physical injury.

Alexander, who is about twenty years of age, caught a train and escaped to Pellston where he was captured that evening. Threats of lynching were heard on every hand but the officers met with no resistance in placing their charge in jail. On Tuesday last he pleaded guilty and now awaits sentence which will be given this week. It is expected he will receive at least five years.—Boyne City Journal.

Charlevoix the Beautiful Court No. 135 met at the I. O. O. F. hall Thursday evening July 15, with all officers present. The court has purchased new paraphernalia which will aid them in putting on the degree work. About sixty members of Court Amy 151, of Boyne City attended the meeting. They brought three new members for the Charlevoix court to initiate in the full degree work. After the business part of the meeting was over a committee was appointed to go to the boat and escort about seventy-five prospective members up to the hall. The following program was then rendered:

Remarks by brother Lloyd Vinyard. Reading by sister Mary Prevost. Story by sister Ranger. Music by sister Irma Cowan. Recitation by sister Grace McNeven. Recitation by brother Ranger. Song by the choir. Remarks by district manager Harry Aiken. Those who took part in the program certainly deserve credit and especially brother Vinyard for the instructive and helpful words which he spoke. District Manager Aiken fearing that we would not have goodies enough, must have robbed some of the bakers in Boyne City by the looks of the big box of eatables that came. Four long tables were beautifully decorated with flowers and heavy laden with good things to eat. The guests and members were then invited into the dining room to supper.

REPUBLICAN RALLY AND BANQUET

Will be Held at Boyne City Friday August 27.

Big Attendance is Desired—Special Program Arranged—Prominent Speakers to be Present.

At an informal meeting of the representative republicans of Charlevoix county held at Boyne City last Wednesday evening, the date of the annual rally was set for Friday evening August 27 at Boyne City. The attendance was large and spirited discussions of the prospects of a complete republican victory in 1916 proved that Charlevoix county had stood undaunted during the past three years and would again be in the fight.

President Curkendall opened the subject of a date for the Charlevoix County Republican Club banquet and rally and the date was set for August 27, this being the most convenient day for all concerned. Committees were appointed and arrangements made for the biggest rally in years.

Many speakers of national reputation were mentioned as being available for the event, among them being Joe Cannon, Townsend, Dieken, Grant Fellows, Fordney and William Alden Smith. Smith would be an interesting speaker as he will be a candidate in the 1916 presidential campaign. At least two famous men will be present to speak, although they may not give lengthy talks.

Membership cards are now in the hands of the club secretary, T. O. Bissell.

All funds raised in this way will be used to defray the banquet expenses, and promoting the interests of the party in this county. Everyone is invited to attend the banquet who is interested in the party. The men in charge hope that the attendance will prove that four years of the present administration is enough for those who give politics a thought.

PICNIC AT MAPLE GROVE

Grangers Making Great Preparations for Annual Event.

Members of Maple Grove Grange announce that they will hold their annual picnic in the grove at the hall on Saturday, August 28.

This is one of the annual events of this section and it is looked forward to with great anticipation. Members of this hustling grange have the reputation of doing things right when they attempt anything, and the picnic this year will be no exception.

The committee in charge are not as yet prepared to announce the list of speakers, but have a number of good ones in view, whose names will be announced later. The usual good dinner will be served by the ladies. Watch these columns for further announcements.

ALL URGED TO ATTEND

Master of Pomona Grange Wants Big Attendance at Ironton Meeting.

To the Grangers of Charlevoix County: Regular meeting of Charlevoix County Pomona Grange at Ironton on Tuesday, August 10. Worthy Master Clark has procured a fine program. Grand Master John C. Ketcham will be there, also D. E. McClure of Lansing is to be present for an address.

With two such able speakers, this meeting ought to be worth your while to attend. We have, as farmer, worked nearly day and night, owing to the backward season. Do not think you have no time to attend. Please arrange to be there—you will go home well pleased and next day be rested in mind and body so you can accomplish a great deal more work, both mentally and physically.

Hoping to meet you there, I am
Fraternally yours,
J. E. Chew, Master.

EXTEND TIME

Corn Contest in "Corn Contest" at County Fair Will Be Given More Time.

Owing to the backwardness of the season coupled with the early fair dates it has been decided to extend the time for notification of intention to exhibit in "Corn Contest" at the Charlevoix County Fair from August 1st to August 20th. It has developed that quite a number have deferred making any notification because of their uncertainty the corn would ripen in time for the fair. This is a mistake however. All that are interested in this corn contest should notify me at once regardless of whether the crop may mature in time or not, for upon the interest manifested this year will largely depend the continuance of contests of this kind. If you have the crop under care please notify me that you intend to make the best display possible.

NEW AUTO LAW AS CHANGED

Measure to Take Effect the First Day of Next January.

Change Will Make Difference in Local Taxes All Over the State.

The secretary of state has compiled, in pamphlet form, the new motor vehicle law, which takes effect in January.

The most important change is in the method of taxation. Under the new law, all cars will be taxed as follows: Gasoline and steam cars, 25 cents a horsepower and 25 cents a hundredweight; electric cars, $1.00 a horsepower and 25 cents a hundredweight.

Gasoline and steam power trucks, 15 cents a horsepower and 15 cents a hundredweight.

Electric trucks, 50 cents a horsepower and 25 cents a hundredweight.

Motorcycles, 25 cents a horsepower and 25 cents a hundredweight.

The weight is to be given by the manufacturers, with the car fully equipped.

The provision, with reference to chauffeurs, remains the same. Chauffeurs must be 18 years of age, and wear badges furnished by the secretary of state conspicuously.

Under the present law, rates are reduced August 1, hereafter they will not be reduced until September 1.

The provision with regard to non-residents grants them a period of at least 90 days upon a license of another state or province if the state or province from whence they come extend the same privilege.

An automobile may be equipped with a single light in front, or two, if desired, but the electric lights in front must be equipped with dimmers. It will be the duty of the driver of a car so equipped to dim his light when approaching another vehicle.

The right of civil action in case of accidents is changed in that the owner shall not be liable after January 1 unless his machine is being driven by his express or implied consent.

SNEAK THIEVES FRUSTRATED IN ATTEMPT TO LOOT BEACH HOTEL

Quick Work of Local Officers Saves Management and Guests From Serious Losses—Chester Murray, House Electrician, and Lillian Hutchinson Under Arrest.

Charlevoix was stirred to a high tension last week when it became known that sneak thieves had boldly robbed the owners of the Beach Hotel and many of the guests.

At first the extent of the crime seemed larger than it has turned out to have been. Many articles alleged to have been stolen have mysteriously returned to their former places, while other articles have been found in their place that might have been overlooked.

Sunday, July 25, after Chester Murray and Miss Lillian Hutchinson who posed as man and wife left the city, it became known that many articles were missing from the hotel. A hurried investigation disclosed that table linen, clothing, tools and jewelry had suddenly disappeared from various parts of the building.

Officers were notified and suspicions were rested on the couple who left so unexpectedly. A post card sent from Harbor Springs and signed Murray, was a first clue and inkling of the whereabouts of the missing goods. The couple were traced to Harbor Springs where it was learned they had boarded the Manitou for Chicago instead of going to Buffalo, as the postal had indicated. The trunk, which was stolen from R. N. Faulkner, was especially noticed when Murray trucked it to the Northern Michigan Transportation Company's dock himself.

Sheriff Novak left Friday evening for Chicago in search of the fugitives and Saturday, with the assistance rendered by the Chicago transfer companies, who had handled the baggage, located and placed them under arrest. He arrived in Charlevoix Sunday morning with the couple in custody.

Monday morning at 9:30 Murray was taken before Justice Cooper in the court room of the court house, where he waived examination and was bound over to circuit court with bonds fixed at $1500. Miss Hutchinson also waived examination and was bound over to the present term of court on bonds fixed to the amount of $1500.

Both of the prisoners were immediately taken before Judge Mayne, where they pleaded guilty to the charge of burglary and were placed in the custody of the sheriff, awaiting sentence which will be pronounced the last of the week. An investigation into the past history of both prisoners will be made before sentence is passed.

The stolen trunk was filled with their own personal belongings, table linen, clothing, etc. The linen was all marked with the Beach Hotel marks and was easily identified. Clothing and other small pieces of finery in ladies wearing apparel were listed among the stolen articles. Many persons called at the sheriff's office Monday to identify their belongings.

Among the stolen articles identified were the trunk, a black fur cap, a nickel-plated punch, and a shawl belonging to Faulkner's. Several chisels taken from the hotel and belonging to John Curtis were identified as was also a vase belonging to Robert Bonthron that was used at the Beach. Twenty pieces of linen with the word Beach or Baker marked on them were also found. A dresser scarf taken from the hotel had been cut up and was practically made up into a waist. Mr. Baker found several tools that belonged to him among the stolen articles.

De Forrest Wood identified hack-saws, files, wood-bites, fixtures, solder and other little supplies that had been taken from his store while Murray was employed there. Many tools were found with various initials marked on them.

Murray came to Charlevoix April 23, and began work for Wood Brothers as an electrician. He latter accepted a position at the Beach Hotel as house electrician. This position gave him an excellent opportunity to carry on the work of sneak-thieving, he being called from time to time to replace lights, etc. in the different rooms of the hotel and cottages.

At the hearing Monday morning Murray stated he scratched the initials of the trunk stolen from Faulkner's home, where the couple roomed. Miss Hutchinson stated that she saw Murray pack the trunk but did not know what was in it. Both prisoners contradicted themselves at different stages of the examination.

The contents of the trunk displayed in the sheriff's office Monday, was a curiosity that many people witnessed. A forged letter recommending Murray was found. The letter stated he had been employed by Mrs. Baker the past two years and that he was an honest, conscientious worker, capable in all lines of electrical work and that he was leaving on account of wife's health. It also stated Murray had superintended the electrical work in the new $30,000 addition of the Beach enterprise, and was signed Mrs. J. S. Baker. Murray, however, had only been employed by the Baker's about a month.

A rigid investigation is being made into the cases of other missing articles not found in possession of Murray and Miss Hutchinson, and no doubt will lead to further prosecutions. Money has been stolen and no trace of the same has been found. Several bits of clothing are reported missing and is gradually showing up. Jewelry ranging to many dollars in value has been missed but in some manner has been returned.

Every effort is being made by the Baker's to protect the guests from further losses, and for the return of the missing articles. As the investigations proceed, many lost or stolen articles come to light, leaving a wide area of suspicion to be traced out. If discoveries are made leading to the guilt of any individuals, a rigid prosecution will follow. Sneak-thieving at the Beach will be suppressed.

This is the first instance of thefts in the history of Charlevoix as a resort, and the officers are to be congratulated on their success in securing the arrest and conviction of the guilty parties, on the first offense of this nature in the city.

HOWE'S GREAT SHOW

Booked to Appear in Charlevoix on Thursday, August 12.

The street parade which will be given by the Howe's Great London Show when it comes here on Thursday, August 12, is well worth coming to see. It is not the old-time parade that has been seen yearly in this section, but one that is so modern as to be refreshing. In it will be seen many features entirely new and which have never before been reviewed in any street pageant ever seen here.

This mighty parade is fully if not over a mile in length. The opportunity will be given to see some of the finest equestrian in this country. There will be herds of elephants, droves of camels, herds of sacred cattle, zebras, llamas, buffalo and other hay eating animals. Of course, there will be many open dens containing wild beasts, beautiful lady and gentlemen riders, the funny clowns, steam pianos, calliope, chimes and Wild West caravan. In the parade will be the most costly tableau wagons, historical and allegorical floats that are carried by any show. It will be well for every one whether or not they intend to see the performance to come early and secure good points of vantage so as not to miss any of the great parade features.

While other shows have been trying to eliminate the parade, the Howe's Great London show has refused to join hands with them in this movement, but instead have enlarged and added to the parade the show gives. Immediately upon the return of the parade to the show grounds a grand free outside exhibition will be given. The feature which will be introduced at this exhibition is of such merit that with any other show it would be the strongest advertised feature, and could never be seen without first paying to do so. With this show it is absolutely free.

THURSDAY AUTO ACCIDENT DAY

Three Accidents Thursday and One Saturday—Auto on Fire.

Donald Swinton Stepped in front of Automobile on the Swing Bridge.

Last Thursday noon, Donald, the six-year-old son of Mr. and Mrs. A. A. Swinton, met with an accident which resulted in the breaking of his left leg just above the ankle.

The boy stepped from the walk into the path of the Marion Center dairy auto in such a manner that one of the front wheels ran over his left foot and ankle. No blame is attached to the driver of the automobile. The child was picked up and taken to the office of Dr. Wilkinson, where the fracture was reduced. The boy will be laid up about three weeks. This is the third accident that has happened on the bridge when a child has recklessly stepped in front of a passing auto.

Thursday noon the car owned by L. S. See, backfired and caught fire from the oil pan. Earl Young ran across the street with a Pyrene fire extinguisher and put the blaze out before any damage was done.

Thursday was a Jonah day on auto accidents. Mrs. Herbert Brown, while backing up her car, ran into the Troy laundry tearing a hole in the side of the building just east of the double doors. Her foot slipped off the clutch causing the accident. No damage was done to the car.

Saturday while crossing the bridge, a lady with her arms filled with bundles, met with an accident when she stepped from the path of one auto and fell directly in front of another. The driver of the car quickly stopped his machine, the front wheel just bumping against the woman as he lay on plank driveway. She was helped to her feet and went about her way more scared than injured.

INCREASES SIZE OF PARCELS

Parcel Post Shipments Increased From 72 inches to 84 inches.

Postmaster General Burleson has ordered that the size limit of packages for parcel post shipment be increased to a combined length and girth of 84 inches, which will permit the mailing of standard sized fruit and berry crates. The old limit was 72 inches length and girth, and there has been a widespread demand for its increase.

The postmaster general also authorized the establishment of a receipt system for parcel post packages similar to that employed by express companies.

"The new regulation," says a department statement, "provides that on payment of one cent the postmaster at the mailing office may give the sender of an ordinary parcel of fourth class mail a receipt therefor. A postage stamp to cover the charge for the receipt will be affixed to the parcel, and the name and the address of the addressee shall be written in the receipt by the sender."

SYNOPSIS.

Frank O'Connell, young Irish patriot, is shot and wounded by British soldiers while making a home rule speech. He is aided by Angela Kingsnorth, an English society girl, who defends him.

O'Connell when well is sent to jail for disturbing the peace. He finally writes Angela that he has finished his sentence.

O'Connell and Angela wed. She has espoused the Irish cause. Her brother, a member of parliament, is very angry.

The happy couple come to America to live. A daughter is born to them. Angela's brother refuses to help the couple in any way. Angela dies.

CHAPTER IX.

Peg's Future.

ONE day the chance of solving the whole difficulty of Peg's future was pinned in O'Connell's hands. But the means were so distasteful to him that he hesitated about even telling her.

He came in unexpectedly in the early afternoon of that day and found a letter waiting for him with an English postmark. Peg had eyed it curiously off and on for hours. She had turned it over and over in her fingers and looked at the curls, angular writing and felt a little cold shiver run up and down her as she found herself wondering who could be writing to her father from England.

When O'Connell walked in and picked the letter up she watched him excitedly. She felt for some strange reason, that they were going to reach a crisis in their lives when the seal was broken and the contents disclosed. Superstition was strong in Peg, and all that day she had been nervous without reason and had exulted without cause.

O'Connell read the letter through twice, slowly the first time, quickly the second. A look of bewilderment came across his face as he sat down and stared at the letter in his hand.

"Who is it from at all?" asked Peg very quietly, though she was trembling all through her body.

Her father said nothing. Presently he read it through again. "It's from England, father, isn't it?" queried Peg, pale as a ghost.

"Yes, Peg," answered her father, and his voice sounded hollow and spiritless.

"I didn't know ye had friends in England," said Peg, crying the letter.

"I haven't," replied her father.

"Then who is it from?" insisted Peg, now all impatience and with a strange fear tugging at her heart.

O'Connell looked up at her as she stood there staring down at him, her big eyes wide open and her lips parted. He took both of her hands in one of his and held them all crushed together for what seemed to Peg to be a long, long while. She hardly breathed. She knew something was going to happen to them both.

At last O'Connell spoke, and his voice trembled and broke: "Peg, do ye remember one mornin', years an' years ago, when I was goin' to speak in County Mayo, an' we started in the cart at dawn, an' we traveled for miles an' miles, an' we came to a great big crossin' where the roads divided an' there was no signpost, an' we asked each other which one we should take, an' I left it to you, an' ye picked a road, an' it brought us out safe and thro' at the spot we were makin' for? Do ye remember it, Peg?"

"Faith I do, father. I remember it well. Ye called me yer little guide and said ye'd follow my road the rest of yer life. An' it's many's the laugh we had when I'd take ye wrong some times afterward." She paused. "What makes ye think of that just now, father?"

He did not answer.

"Is it on account o' that letter?" she persisted.

"It is, Peg." He spoke with difficulty, as if the words hurt him to speak.

"We've got to a great big crossin' place again where the roads branch off, an' I don't know which one to take."

"Are ye goin' to leave it to me again, father?" said Peg.

"That's what I can't make up me mind about, dear, for it may be that ye'll go down one road and me down the other."

"No, father," Peg cried passionately, "that we won't. Whatever the road we'll travel it together."

"I'll think it out by meself, Peg. Lave me for awhile—alone. I want to think it out by meself—alone."

"If it's separation ye're thinkin' of make up yer mind to one thing—that I'll never leave you. Never!"

"Take Michael out for a spell and come back in half an hour, and in the meanwhile I'll hate it all out in me mind."

She bent down and straightened the furrows in his forehead with the tips of her fingers and kissed him and then whispered to the wistful Michael, and together they went running down the street toward the little patch of green where the children played and among whom Michael was a prime favorite. Sitting, his head in his hands, his eyes staring into the past, O'Connell was facing the second great tragedy of his life.

While O'Connell sat there in that little room in New York trying to decide Peg's fate a man who had played some considerable part in O'Connell's life lay in a splendidly furnished room in a mansion in the west end of London—dying.

Nathaniel Kingsnorth's twenty years of loneliness and desolation were coming to an end. What an empty, arid stretch of time those years seemed to him as he feebly looked back on them!

After the tragedy of his sister's reckless marriage he deserted public life entirely and shut himself away in his country house, except for a few weeks in London occasionally when his presence was required on one of another of the boards of which he was a director.

The Irish estate, which brought about all his misfortunes, he disposed of at a ridiculously low figure. He said he would accept any bid, however small, so that he could sever all connection with the hated village.

From the day of Angela's elopement he neither saw nor wrote to any member of his family.

His other sister, Mrs. Chichester, wrote to him from time to time telling him one time of the birth of a boy, two years later of the advent of a girl.

Kingsnorth did not answer any of her letters.

In no way dismayed Mrs. Chichester continued to write periodically. She wrote him when her son Alaric went to school and also when he went to college. Alaric seemed to absorb most of her interest. He was evidently her favorite child. She wrote more seldom of her daughter, Ethel, and when she did happen to refer to her she dwelt principally on her beauty and her accomplishments. Five years before an envelope in deep mourning came to Kingsnorth, and on opening it he found a letter from his sister acquainting him with the melancholy news that Mr. Chichester had ended a life of usefulness at the English bar and had died, leaving the family quite comfortably off.

Kingsnorth telegraphed his condolences and left instructions for a suitable wreath to be sent to the funeral. But he did not attend it, nor did he at any time express the slightest wish to see his sister, nor did he encourage any suggestion on her part to visit him.

When he was stricken with an illness from which no hope of recovery was held out to him he at once began to put his affairs in order, and his lawyer spent days with him drawing up statements of his last wishes for the disposition of his fortune.

With death stretching out its hand to snatch him from a life he had enjoyed so little his thoughts, colored with the fancies of a tired, sick brain, kept turning constantly to his dead sister Angela.

From time to time down through the years he had a softened, gentle remembrance of her. When the news of her death came, furious and unrelenting as he had been toward her, her passing softened it. Had he known in time he would have insisted on her burial in the Kingsnorth vault. But she had already been interred in New York before the news of her death reached him.

The one bitter hatred of his life had been against the man who had taken his sister in marriage and in so doing had killed all possibility of Kingsnorth succeeding in his political and social aspirations.

He heard vaguely of a daughter. He took no interest in the news.

Now, however, the remembrance of his treatment of Angela burnt into him. He especially repented of that merciless exile, "You have made your bed; lie in it." It haunted him through the long hours of his slow and painful illness. Had he helped her she might have been alive today, and those bitter reflections that ate into him night and day might have been replaced by gentler ones and so make his end the more peaceful.

He thought of Angela's child and wondered if she were like his poor dead sister. The wish to see the child became an obsession with him.

One morning, after a restless, feverish night, he sent for his lawyer and told him to at once institute inquiries—find out if the child was still living and if so where.

This his lawyer did. He located O'Connell in New York through a friend of his in the Irish party and found that the child was living with him in rather poor circumstances. He communicated the result of his inquiries to Kingsnorth. That day a letter was sent to O'Connell asking him to allow his child to visit her dying uncle. O'Connell was to cable at Kingsnorth's expense, and if he would consent the money for the expenses of the journey would be cabled immediately. The girl was to start at once, as Mr. Kingsnorth had very little longer to live.

When the letter had gone Kingsnorth drew a breath of relief. He longed to see the child. He would have to wait impatiently for the reply. Perhaps the man whom he had hated all his life would refuse his request. If he did—well, he would make some provision in his will for her in memory of his dead sister.

The next day he altered his entire will and made Margaret O'Connell a special legacy. Ten days later a cable came:

I consent to my daughter's visiting you.

FRANK OWEN O'CONNELL.

The lawyer cabled at once, making all arrangements through their bankers in New York for Miss O'Connell's journey.

That night Kingsnorth slept without being disturbed. He awoke refreshed in the morning. It was the first kindly action he had done for many years.

How much had he robbed himself of all his life if by doing so little he was repaid so much!

O'Connell had a hard struggle with Peg before she would consent to leave him. She met all his arguments with counter arguments. Nothing would move her for hours.

"Why should I go to a man I have never seen and hate the name of?" "He's your uncle, Peg."

"It's a fine uncle he's been to me all me life. And it was a grand way he threatened me mother when she was starvin'."

"He wants to do somebith' for ye now, Peg."

"I'll not go to him."

"Now listen, dear, it's little I'll have to have ye when I'm gone," pleaded O'Connell.

"I'll not listen to any talk at all about yer goin'. Yer a great, strong, healthy man—that's what ye are. What are ye talkin' about? What's got into yer head about goin'?"

"The time must come some day, Peg."

"All right. We'll know how to face it when it does. But we're not goin' out all the way to meet it," said Peg resolutely.

CHAPTER X.

Peg Away From Home.

FOR the next few days Peg was busy preparing herself for the journey and buying little things for her scanty equipment. Then the cable came to the effect that a passage was reserved for her and money was waiting at a banker's for her expenses. This Peg obstinately refused to touch. She didn't want anything except what her father gave her.

When the morning of her departure came poor Peg woke with a heavy heart. It was their first parting, and she was miserable.

O'Connell, on the contrary, seemed full of life and high spirits. He laughed at her and joked with her and made a little bundle of some things that would not go in her bag and that he had kept for her to the last minute.

They were a rosary that had been his mother's, a prayer book Father Cahill gave him the day he was confirmed and lastly the little miniature of Angela.

It was his heart to part with it, but he wanted Peg to have it near her, especially as she was going among the relations of the dead woman. All through this O'Connell showed not a trace of emotion, before Peg he kept telling her there was nothing to be sad about. It was all going to be for her good.

When the time came to go the strange pair made their way down to the ship—the tall, erect, splendid looking man and the little red haired girl in her simple black suit and her little black hat with red flowers to brighten it.

O'Connell went aboard with her, and an odd couple they looked on the sunken deck, with Peg holding on to Michael, much to the amusement of the passengers, the visitors and stewards.

Poor, stanch, loyal, honest, true little Peg, going alone to—what? Leaving the one human being she cared for and worshipped—her playmate, counselor, friend and father—all in one!

O'Connell never dropped his high spirits all the time they were together on board the ship. He went aboard with a laugh, and when the bell rang for all visitors to go ashore he said goodby to Peg with a laugh, while poor Peg's heart felt like a stone in her breast. She stood sopping up against the rail of the sunken deck as the ship swung clear. She was looking for her father through the mists of ears that killed her.

Just as the boat slowly swept past the end of the dock she saw him right at the last post so that he could watch the boat unobscured until it was out of sight. He was crying himself now—crying like a child—and as the boat swung away he called up: "My little Peg! Peg o' my heart!" How she longed to get off the ship and go back to him! They stood waving to each other as long as they remained in sight.

While the ship plowed her way toward England with little Peg on board the man whom she was crossing the Atlantic to meet died quietly on a morning with no one near him.

The nurse found Mr. Kingsnorth smiling peacefully as though asleep. He had been dead several hours.

Near him on the table was a cable dispatch from New York:

My daughter called on the Mauretania today at 10 o'clock.

Mrs. Chichester, whom we last saw under extremely distressing circumstances in Ireland, now enters prominently into the story. She was leading a secluded and charming existence in an old and picturesque villa at Scarborough, in the north of England. Although her husband had been dead for several years, she still clung to the outward symbols of mourning. It added a softness to the pathetic line of

The administration announces that it intends to lay before congress "an adequate programme" of national defence.
This will cost money. The treasury deficit at the end of the fiscal year, June 30, was around $40,000,000. The deficit for the single month of July in the current fiscal year is close to half that sum.
On the first of May, 1916, sugar goes on the free list, which will entail a loss of revenue amounting to more than $10,000,000. On the 31st of December, 1915, the so-called "war taxes" will expire by limitation, entailing a decrease of many more millions in revenue.
Therefore, it is plainly to be seen that whether we provide for national defence or not increased revenue must be had.
The Democratic leaders are considering this question. They plan to put a tax on tea, on coffee, on bananas, and on several other articles of common consumption. In other words, they intend to tax every man's table. When the Democrats took over the government they found a full treasury and ample revenues. They found, too, a steady program of naval construction and other items of national defence. In two short years they have emptied the treasury, have diminished the revenues, have cri-pled the navy and the army, until now, when the question of defence looms up they can deal with it only after they have dealt with a deficit. The real way to handle both questions, defence and deficit, is to restore the Republican party to power.

What a comforting assurance it is to the relatives and friends of the Eastland disaster in Chicago last week to know that both city and federal authorities are making a thorough investigation.
Let all tears be dried and let the public forget—until some similar disaster occurs. And then let's have the same comforting assurance and the same investigation.

Forty-first Annual State Convention of W. C. T. U.

Report of Meeting Prepared By Local Delegate, Mrs. S. J. Alcox—Printed By Request.

In Van Buren county the county officers gave space at the county fair for a W. C. T. U. booth, free of charge, where they gave out temperance literature, displayed banners and posters.
Washtenaw county held a membership contest and more than doubled their membership having a net gain of 110.
One union had a poster parade and a decorated auto. Ionia county, dry eight years, membership 263. One union made a gain of 41 members last year.
Jackson county wet, cheated out at last election but just wait until next time and we will not be again. Calhoun county, dry last spring, gave $25.00 to the campaign fund. St. Clair county, without a county president for three years, but a ministers wife went into a joint one evening and found 25 young women drinking. She went to the prosecuting attorney and told him she would give him just three days to do something and he got out and raided the joint.
Grand Rapids canvassed the town and got 69 new members and 19 young men as honorary members who wear the white ribbon.

The convention called at two o'clock in the afternoon and was given to reports of scientific temperance instruction, kindergarten and physical education, press, anti-narcotics, medal contests institutes, rescue and juvenile offenders, and reports of the general officers. The state president gave one of the finest reports. She said there has been a great change of sentiment in the legislature in the past four years regarding the temperance question. The vice-president said the reason the Hobson amendment did not carry was because it was made a party issue. Mrs. Parish, corresponding-secretary, gave the total net gain of members in the state this year as 2,263.

The eighth district is the banner district having made the largest net gain in state. The largest union in the state is Pontiac with 196 members.
Chippewa county is the banner county.
The district and county presidents were called to the platform and all who had made a gain of 50 or more members were given a blue ribbon, those having a gain of 25 a red ribbon and those holding their own receiving a white ribbon.
Our county has held its own and so in the absence of Mrs. Burdick, I stepped forward and was given the white ribbon.
Twenty-three counties received blue ribbons, ten counties red ribbons and 20 counties the white ribbon.

Bozette City had made a 20 per cent gain and Mancelona a ten per cent gain.
Mrs. Calkins, president of the fourth district, reported every county dry, also every county in the sixth district dry, it was shown that districts having all dry counties are the districts having the largest membership.

A 4:15 a. sufrage address was given by Mrs. Rachel A. Bailey of Grand Rapids, who gave reminiscences of Susan B. Anthony and of the adding of the sufrage department in the W. C. T. U.

Thursday evening a diamond medal contest was held in charge of Mrs. M.
E. Butler, state superintendent. Delightful music was rendered by two young ladies and a male quartet. The contestants (young women) all did splendidly, the medal coming to our own eleventh district to a young lady from Benzonia.

After the devotionals, Friday morning was filled with more reports of superintendents and more reports of district presidents. Mrs. Howard, in giving her report on christian citizenship, declared that a drunken newspaper should be no more welcome in our homes than a live bar keeper.

At 11 o'clock came election of officers.
After numbering it was found that there were 106 voting delegates present.
Mrs. Calkins was re-elected president.
Mrs. Norma Mudge corresponding-secretary in place of Mrs. Julia R. Parish, who had held the office for 22 years.
Mrs. Lockwood, recording secretary and Mrs. D. G. Jones, treasurer.

The eighth district president reported that the Clare ladies attended the school meeting and defeated the wet candidate.
Friday evening the music was in charge of the captain of the Salvation Army and the singing by the children was very sweet. Ten children gave a anti-cigarette drill each one reciting and then marching in a circle singing, "We'll never, never, touch a cigarette, so we won't, no we won't." The president introduced Miss Sprawl of the Canadian "Soo," missionary of the New Orleans district, which comprises about one-third of the province. She said there are only 17,000 members in the whole dominion but said that one union would raise more money than some of your whole districts. She spoke of the boys from Canada, sons of advocates of peace and arbitration, dying in the trenches of Europe. She said she had been in camps where she did not see a woman or child for a week at a time and thought it a great tribute to men who are supposed to be rough that she always received the greatest courtesy and kindness. She told of a man who was injured fatally who when dying was asked about his soul and he said, Oh yes I know Jesus and I am not afraid to die. The woman who wore the white ribbon told me about him—had given an average of one address and a half a day last year and travelled 8,000 miles; she hoped that out of this terrible war would come to a better condition for both you and us and believe that out of it would come prohibition for the world. The president said she had hoped that some one would have a union Jack with them.
Several were held up and one was brought to the platform and waved by
Mrs. Calkins amid great applause.

Saturday morning the reports of the resolutions committee was given and an hour or more spent in amending and adopting them. Edith Smith Davis, worlds and national superintendent of scientific temperance instruction, was introduced and given the chautauqua salute.

The committee on the financial plan for raising the campaign fund for state wide prohibition suggested that every member put a penny a day aside during the month of September, the local presidents to collect the money and send to the state treasurer by the first of November. Also every member to interview a voter, preach him a little prohibition sermon and ask him for 25c, $1.00 or $25.00 and have a rally day to begin the work. This plan was ratified by the convention.

Saturday afternoon a one hour institute was held in charge of Mrs. Perkins.
Unions were asked to tell the biggest thing their unions had done during the year. I told them how we distributed $5.00 worth of Ford's book on cigarettes through the Y. M. C. A. secretary and of having the column in our local paper.
A committee came forward and in behalf of the delegates presented Mrs.
Parish, the retiring corresponding-secretary, who had served for 22 years, with a bouquet of flowers and a set of sterling silver spoons in recognition of her sterling qualities.

Saturday evening was a demonstration of the departments and of the 12 districts—an immense affair. The L.
T. L. and young people's departments came first. There were rally cries and songs galore.

Another one of those enjoyable dancing parties was held at the Hotel Michigan last Friday evening. Friday night of this week is planned for one of the best held so far this season. The Belvedere orchestra furnished the music, which in itself is a treat.

Tuesday's severe rain and wind storm raised havoc among the pleasure boats anchored on Pine and Round Lakes. Near the Belvedere dock, the sailing yacht Argo and several other pleasure crafts were blown ashore and on Round Lake everything received a severe shaking up. Reports from Harbor Springs give information that practically every boat anchored in that harbor were blown ashore and considerable damage done.

From the number of accidents occurring on the swing bridge, it seems strange to the onlooker that the city council does not take some steps along the line of prevention. Hardly a day passes that someone relates of their narrow escape from being run down by an automobile or vehicle. The amount of traffic calls for unusual vigilance on the part of the pedestrian. Older people are more careful than children. Why not place a railing on each side the bridge, of a nature that will prevent people from crossing the vehicle track after they once start to make the crossing. This would prevent many accidents, and especially prevent those who are continually running from one side of the bridge to the other. Prevention of this nature would be greatly appreciated by drivers of cars and rigs, as at no time are they sure of a clear driveway after they once get upon the bridge. Practically every accident that has occurred so far was the result of efforts to cross from one side of the bridge to the other. A railing would prevent this.

POULTRY and EGGS

PAYING EGG YIELDS.

Poultry Must Be Well Cared For to Produce a Profit.

It is a fact that chickens return for the money invested in them a greater profit, if they are properly cared for, than does any other class of stock, writes a correspondent of the National Stockman. But it is also a fact that if they are made to yield a profitable number of eggs they must consume more valuable grain feed than do most other farm animals. Therefore, if more chickens are kept than can be properly cared for, the feed they consume will make them lose money very fast.

There are several reasons why the hen often "puts her head off" or lays her eggs all at a time when they are

As its name indicates the Rhode Island Red breed of fowl originated in New England's smallest state. These fowls have both single and rose combs and are good egg producers, rapid growers of flesh and generally hardy and able to resist. For winter and early spring eggs they are hard to beat. During August and the fall months the Rhode Island Red hen produces the best eggs. The picture shows a Rhode Island Red hen.

cheap and will not pay for the high priced feed she has consumed. And the owner of a large flock of chickens that consume large quantities of feed should know the cost of keeping so many chickens, feeding them an entire year for the egg yield. When the feed cost is greater than the egg yield there are several reasons for it. If the person in charge of the chickens is too busy with other matters to provide scratching floors in whiter, green feed and feed to take the place of worms when the ground is cold or frozen, and various other things a hen must have if she is to lay high priced eggs out of season, the owner of the flock will lose money.

A second important requirement that the farm flock must have besides good housing and care is good blood. If a hen is to lay a paying number of eggs per year she must be from some heavy laying strain and pure bred. It would be useless to give a flock of chickens the best of care if they were not from a heavy laying strain. With such blood the poultryman or farmer can expect to get 100 to 140 eggs from each hen per year.

her features and a touch of distinction to her manner and pose. She had an illustrious example of a lifelong sorrow, and, being ever loyal, Mrs. Chichester retained the weeds of widowhood and the crepe of affliction ever present.

She was proud indeed of her two children, about whom she had written an glowingly to her brother Nathaniel. Alaric was the elder. In him Mrs. Chichester took the greater pride. He was so nearly being great—even from infancy—that he continually kept his mother in a condition of expectant wonder. He was nearly brilliant at school. At college he almost got his degree. He just missed his "blue" at cricket, and but for an unfortunate ball dribbling over the net at a critical moment in the semi-final of the tennis championships he might have won the cup. He was quite philosophic about it, though, and never appeared to reproach fate for treating him so shabbily.

He was always nearly doing something, and kept Mrs. Chichester in a lively condition of trusting hope and occasional disappointment. She knew he would "arrive" some day—come into his own. Then all these half-rewarded efforts would be invaluable in the building of his character.

Her daughter, Ethel, on the other hand, was the exact antithesis to Alaric. She had never shown the slightest interest in anything since she had first looked up at the man of medicine who ushered her into the world. She regarded everything about her with the greatest complacency. She was never surprised or angry or pleased or depressed. Sorrow never seemed to affect her—nor joy make her smile. She looked on life as a gentle brook down whose current she was perfectly content to drift undisturbed. At least that was the effect created in Mrs. Chichester's mind. She never thought it possible there might be latent possibilities in her impassive daughter.

While her mother admired Ethel's lofty attitude of indifference toward the world, a manner that bespoke the aristocrat, she secretly chafed at her daughter's lack of enthusiasm.

How different from Alaric, always full of nearly new ideas, always about to do something. Alaric kept those around him on the alert. No one ever really knew what he would do next. On the other hand, Ethel depressed by her stolid content with everything about her. Every one knew what she would do—or thought they did.

Mrs. Chichester had long since abandoned any further attempt to interest her brother Nathaniel in the children. Angela's wretched marriage had upset everything—driven Nathaniel to be a recluse and to close his doors on near and distant relatives.

Angela's death the following year did not relieve the situation. If anything, it intensified it, since she left a baby that, naturally, none of the family could possibly take the slightest notice of—nor interest in.

It was tacitly agreed never to speak of the unfortunate incident, especially before the children. It was such a terrible example for Ethel and so discouraging to the eager and ambitious Alaric.

Consequently Angela's name was never spoken inside of Regal Villa.

And so the Chichester family pursued an even course, only varied by Alaric's sudden and definite decisions to enter either public life, or athletics, or the army, or the world of art—it was really extremely hard for so well equipped a young man to decide to limit himself to any one particular pursuit. Consequently he put off the final choice from day to day.

Suddenly a most untoward incident happened.

Alaric, returning from a long walk, alone—during which he had almost decided to become a doctor—walked through the windows from the garden into the living room and found his mother in tears, an open letter in her hand.

This was most unusual. Mrs. Chichester was not wont to give vent to open emotion. It shows a lack of breeding. So she always suppressed it. It seemed to grow inward. To find her weeping—and almost madly—impressed Alaric that something of more than usual importance had occurred.

"Hello, mother?" he cried cheerfully, though his looks belied the buoyancy of his tone. "Hello! What's the matter? What's up?"

At the same moment Ethel came in through the door.

It was 11:30, and precisely at that time every morning Ethel practiced for half an hour on the piano—not that she had the slightest interest in music, but it helped the morning so much. She would look forward to it for an hour before and think of it for an hour afterward, and then it was tantamount to practically filled out the entire morning.

Mrs. Chichester looked up as her beloved children came toward her, and real tears were in her eyes, and a real note of alarm was in her voice:

"Oh, Ethel! Oh, Alaric!"

Alaric was at her side in a moment. He was genuinely alarmed.

Ethel moved slowly across, thinking vaguely that something must have disagreed with her mother.

"What is it, mother?" cried Alaric.

"Mother!" said Ethel, with as nearly a tone of emotion as she could feel.

"We're ruined!" sobbed Mrs. Chichester.

"Nonsense!" said the bewildered son.

"Really?" asked the placid daughter.

"Our bank has failed! Every penny your father left me was in it!"

wailed Mrs. Chichester. "We're nothing!—nothing! We're beggars!"

A horrible fear for a moment gripped Alaric—the dread of poverty. He shivered. Suppose such a thing should really happen! Then he dismissed it with a shrug of his shoulders. How perfectly absurd! Poverty, indeed! The Chichesters beggars? Such nonsense!

He turned to his mother and found her holding out a letter and a newspaper. He took them both and read them with mingled amazement and disgust. First the headline of the newspaper caught his eye:

"Failure of Gifford's Bank."

Then he looked at the letter:

"Gifford's bank suspended business yesterday." Back his eye traveled to the paper.

"Gifford's Bank Has Closed Its Doors!"

He was quite unable at first to grasp the full significance of the contents of that letter and newspaper. He turned to Ethel:

"Ethel?" he gasped.

"Pity," she murmured, trying to find a particular place of music among the mass on the piano.

"We're ruined!" reiterated Mrs. Chichester.

Then the real meaning of those cryptic headlines and the businesslike letter broke in on Alaric. All the Chichester blood was roused in him.

"Now, that's what I call a downright, rotten, blackguardly shame—a blackguardly shame!" His voice rose in tones as it increased in gusto until it almost reached a shriek.

Something was expected of him—at any rate, indignation. Well, he was certainly indignant.

"Closed its doors, indeed!" he went on. "Why should it close its doors? That's what I want to know! Why—should it?" And he glared at the offending letter and the unbecomingly newspaper.

He looked at Ethel, who was surreptitiously concealing a yawn and was apparently quite undisturbed by the appalling news. He found no inspiration there. Back he went to his mother for support.

"What right have banks to fail? There should be a law against it. They should be made to open their doors and keep 'em open. That's what we give 'em our money for—so that we can take it out again when we want it!"

Poor Mrs. Chichester shook her head sadly.

"Everything gone!" she moaned. "Ruined, and at my age!"

CHAPTER XI.

ALARIC sat on the edge of her chair and put his arm around her shoulder and tried to comfort her.

"Don't you worry, mother," he said.

"Don't worry. I'll go down and tell 'em what I think of 'em—exactly what I think of 'em. They can't play the fool with me. I should think not, indeed. Listen, mother. You've got a son, thank God, and one no bank can take any liberties with. What was put in there we've got to have out. That's all I can say. We're simply got to have it out. There! I've said it."

Alaric rose and, drawing himself up to his full five feet six inches of manhood, glared malignantly at some imaginary bank officials. His whole nature was roused. The future of the family depended on him. They would not depend in vain. He looked at Ethel, who was trying to make the best of the business by smiling agreeably on them both.

"It's bankrupt!" wailed Mrs. Chichester.

"Failed!" suggested Ethel cheerfully.

"We're beggars," continued the mother.

"I must live on charity for the rest of my life, the guest of relations I've hated the sight of and who have hated me. It's dreadful—dreadful!"

All Alaric's first glow of manly enthusiasm began to cool.

"Don't you think we'll get anything?" By accident he turned to Ethel. She smiled meaningfully and said for the first time with any real note of conviction:

"Nothing!"

Alaric sat down gloomily beside his mother.

"I always thought bank directors were blighters. Good heavens, what a mess!" He looked the picture of misery. "What's to become of Ethel, mother?"

"Whoever shelters me must shelter Ethel as well," replied the mother, sad. "But it's hard—my age—to be sheltered."

Alaric looked at Ethel, and a feeling of pity came over him. It was directly to his credit, since his own wrongs occupied most of his attention. But, after all, he could buffet the world and wring a living out of it. All he had to do was to make up his mind which walk in life to choose. He was fortunate.

But Ethel, reared from infancy in the environment of independence—it would come very hard and bitter on her

Alaric just touched Ethel's hand, and with as much feeling as he could muster he said:

"Sobbing, tough, old girl."

Ethel shook her head almost determinedly and said somewhat enigmatically and for her benefit:

"No."

"No?" asked Alaric. "No—what?"

"Charity!" said Ethel.

"Cold blooded words," and Alaric shuddered. "What will you do, Ethel?"

"Work."

"At what?"

"Teach."

"Teach? Who in the wide world can you teach?"

"Children."

Alaric laughed mirthlessly. "Oh, come, that's rich! Eh, mother? Fancy Ethel teaching grubby little brats their A B C's! Tush!"

"Must!" said Ethel, quite unmoved.

"A Chichester teach?" said Alaric, in disgust.

"Settled!" from Ethel, and she swept her fingers slowly across the piano.

"Very well," said Alaric determinedly. "I'll work too."

Mrs. Chichester looked up pleadingly. Alaric went on: "I'll put my hand to the plow. The more I think of it the keener I am to begin. From today I'll be a workman."

At this Ethel laughed a queer, little, odd, so, scintillating note, summed up in a single word, "Ha!" There was nothing malicious in it. There was no reproach in it. It was just an expression of her honest feeling at the bare suggestion of her brother working.

Alaric turned quickly to her.

"And may I ask why that 'Ha'?"

"Why, I ask you? There's nothing I couldn't do if I were really put to it—not a single thing. Is there, mother?"

His mother looked up proudly at him.

"I know that, dear. But it's dreadfully full of thought of you—working."

"Not at all," said Alaric. "I'm just tingling all over at the thought of it. The only reason I haven't so far is because I've never had to. But now that I have I'll just buckle on my armor, so to speak, and outstep you all."

Again came that dandy, cold unsympathetic "Ha!" from Ethel.

"Please don't laugh in that cheerless way. Ethel. It goes all down my spine. Jerry's always telling me I ought to do something—that the world is for the worker—and all that. He's right, and I'm going to show him."

He suddenly picked up the paper and looked at the date.

"What's today—the 1st? Yes, so it is—June the 1st. Jerry's coming today—all his family too. They've taken Noel's folly, on the hill. He's sure to look in here. Couldn't be better. He's the core to turn to in a case like this."

Jarvis, a white haired, dignified butler, who had served the family man and boy, came in at this juncture with a visiting card on a saucer.

Alaric picked it up and glanced at it. He gave an expression of disgust and flung the card back on the saucer.

"Christian Brent."

For the first time Ethel showed more than a passing gleam of interest. She stopped strumming the piano and stood up, very erect and very still.

"Mrs. Chichester rose too. 'I can't see any one,' she said imperatively.

"Nor I," added Alaric. "I'm all strung up." He turned to Jarvis. "Tell him to wait."

Alaric drew himself to his full height.

"What's today—the 1st? Yes, so it is—June the 1st. Jerry's coming today—all his family too. They've taken Noel's folly, on the hill. He's sure to look in here. Couldn't be better. He's the core to turn to in a case like this."

Jarvis, a white haired, dignified butler, who had served the family man and boy, came in at this juncture with a visiting card on a saucer.

Alaric picked it up and glanced at it. He gave an expression of disgust and flung the card back on the saucer.

"Christian Brent."

For the first time Ethel showed more than a passing gleam of interest. She stopped strumming the piano and stood up, very erect and very still.

"Mrs. Chichester rose too. 'I can't see any one,' she said imperatively.

"Nor I," added Alaric. "I'm all strung up." He turned to Jarvis. "Tell air, even were very sorry, but—"I'll see him," interrupted Ethel, almost animatedly. "Bring Mr. Brent here, Jarvis."

As Jarvis went in search of Mr. Brent, Mrs. Chichester went up the great stairs. "My head is throbbing. I'll go to my room."

"Don't you worry, mother," coaxed Alaric. "Leave everything to me. I'll thrash the whole thing out."

As Mrs. Chichester disappeared Alaric turned to his calm elder, who, strangely enough, was showing some signs of life and interest.

"Really going to teach?"

"Yes."

"Right! I'll find something, too—very likely a doctor. We'll pull through somehow."

Ethel made a motion toward the door as though to stop any further conversation.

"Mr. Brent's coming," she said, almost impatiently.

Alaric started for the window leading to the garden.

"Only good of you to let him bore you. I hate the sight of the beggar myself. Always looks to me like the first conspirator at a play."

The door opened, and Jarvis entered and ushered in "Mr. Brent." Alaric hurried into the garden.

A few words of description of Christian Brent might be of interest since his represents a type that society always has with it.

They begin by deceiving others; they end by deceiving themselves.

Christian Brent was a dark, tense, eager, scholarly looking man of twenty-eight years of age. His career as a diplomatist was halted at its outset by an early marriage with the only daughter of a prosperous manufacturer.

Brent was moderately independent in his own right, but the addition of his wife's dowry seemed to destroy all ambition. He no longer found interest in carrying messages to the various legations or embassies of Europe at his filling a routine position as some one's secretary. From being an intensely eager man of affairs he drifted into a social lounge—the laydog of the drawing room—where the close breath of some rare perfume meant more than the clash of interests and the conquest of a woman greater than that of a nation.

Just at this period Ethel Chichester was the special object of his adoration.

Her beauty appealed to him.

Her absolute indifference to him stung him as a lash. It seemed to belittle his powers of attraction. Consequently he redoubled his efforts.

Ethel showed neither like nor dislike—just a form of toleration. Brent accepted this, as a dog a crumb, in the hope of something more substantial to follow. He had come that morning with a fixed resolve. His manner was determined. His voice wooed as a caress. He went tenderly to Ethel the moment the door closed on Jarvis.

"How are you?" he asked, and there was a note of subdued passion in his tone.

"Fair," replied Ethel without even looking at him.

"Where is your mother?" suggesting that much depended on the answer.

"Lying down," answered Ethel truthfully and without any feeling.

"And Alaric?"

"In the garden."

"Then we have a moment or two—alone?" Brent put a world of meaning into the suggestion.

"Very likely," said Ethel, picking up a score of "Polème" and looking at it as if she saw it for the first time, all the while watching him through her half closed eyes.

Brent went to her. "Glad to see me?" he asked.

"Why not?"

"I am glad to see you"—he bent over her—"most glad."

"Really?"

He sat beside her. "Ethel," he whispered intensely, "I am at the crossroads."

"Oh!" commenced Ethel, without any interest.

"It came last night."

"Did it?"

"This is the end—between Sibyl and myself."

"Is it?"

"Yes—the end. It's been horrible from the first—horrible. There's not a word of mine—not an action—she doesn't misunderstand."

"How boring!" said Ethel blandly.

Temperance

(Conducted by the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union.)

WHAT THE PUBLIC NEEDS.

"Life is getting to be too complicated for the use of narcotics," said Dr. S. P. Kramer, the noted surgeon, in a recent address at the Ricketts Research Laboratory, Cincinnati. "The time was when the farmer could drive to town and get loaded up and his friends would put him in the buggy and the sober horse would carry him home. But you can not do that now with automobiles. We know that most of the automobile accidents are after dinners where alcohol has been served, and that not always in excess."

After describing the effects of alcohol as similar to those of chloroform or ether, except for the fact that it works more slowly, he considered its effect upon efficiency in various fields of endeavor, and showed charts proving the lowered working power of compositors, bookkeepers and soldiers after they have taken liquor.

"But a friend said to me," remarked Dr. Kramer, continuing the same line of argument, "Doctor, you must know that Mr. Blank, the jury lawyer, is more eloquent in his cups, and that the celebrated actor was more impressive when drinking." I asked this man if he would want his chauffeur, his locomotive engineer, his surgeon, to drink. He said he would not. Now the orator and the actor are in vocal pursuits. Alcohol makes them more passionate. But the judge on the bench knows that the lawyer is less capable of keen analysis when in his cups, and the trained dramatic critic will tell you that the drinking actor is not coming up to what he should. These men are like the court jesters. The fact is that the higher centers are off the job. The governor is not acting and the engine runs wild. That is all.

"No one nowadays thinks drunkenness is well. What the public needs is instruction about the destructive effect of moderate indulgence."

EMPTY JAILS.

The following testimony to the advantages of prohibition appeared in one of the newspapers of Sussex county, Delaware:

"The county jail at Georgetown is without a prisoner, and Sheriff Jacob West is idle. The turnkey is on his vacation, chickens are roosting in the cells and the jail yard will probably be planted in early corn unless another applicant appears. The lone prisoner, Elwood Armstrong, who was afraid to stay by himself, was paroled for two years after having confessed to stealing five dozen eggs."

Further testimony as to the workings of prohibition comes from Kalamazoo, Mich. The Gazette of that city on April 5 contains a paragraph headed, "Kalamazoo Without Crime for 48 Hours—Crimeless Period of City's History Follows Knockout of John Barleycorn," and the item reads: "Rooms for rent. Apply within." This is the text of a sign which will likely be tacked on the front door of central police station in another week if the period of quiet continues. Not a cell door in the station house has been opened during the last 48 hours. The 'bull pen' is as barren and quiet as an abandoned country church. There has not been a single drunk arrested since Sunday afternoon. Crime in general appears to be at a standstill."

BOYS AND BREWERIES.

A man was trying to convince another that because of the vested interests involved the people had no right to close the breweries. His friend answered thus: "I have three boys. By the time I graduate them from college they will have cost me about ten thousand dollars apiece. Every interest of the brewery and everything that the brewery stands for is diametrically opposed to and threatens the investment that I have made in my boys. No doubt, the brewer has more than thirty thousand invested in his plant, but I am going to safeguard my own interests first— I shall vote dry within ten minutes after the polls open if I can get my ballot by that time."

JOHN BARLEYCORN SENTENCED.

In pronouncing sentence on over one hundred men, including the mayor of Terre Haute, Ind., for conspiracy in election frauds, Judge Anderson of the United States district court passed sentence as well on John Barleycorn. He said: "My notion is that the saloon will have to go. I believe that the time will come when the people will rise up and smash the saloon, at least as we have it now. The evidence in this case showed that the saloons were the center of nearly all the corruption in the election at Terre Haute."

PRINTERS AND WHISKY.

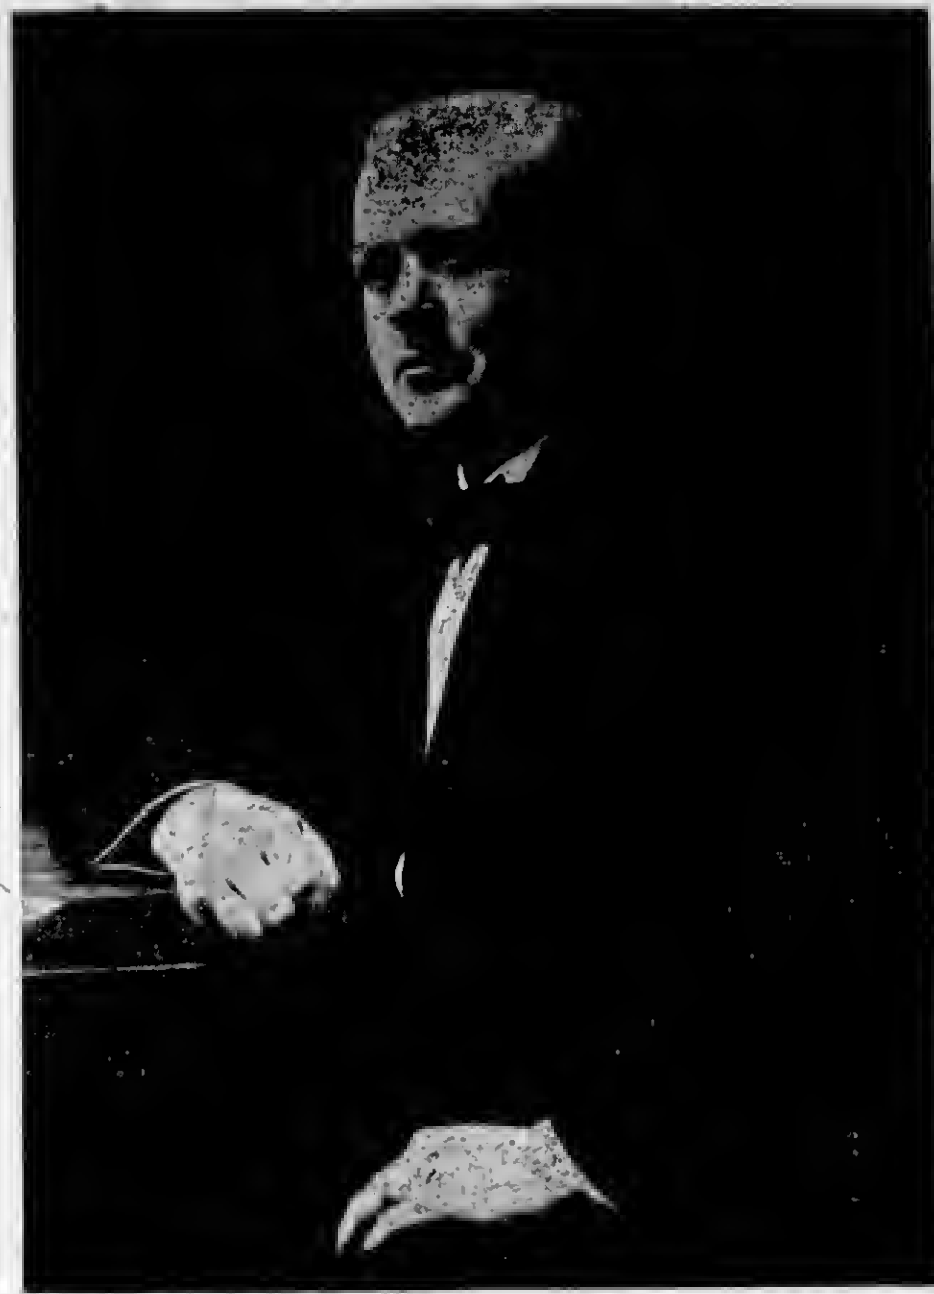

"More printers are barred by whisky than by all the insubstantial shops in the world," President Wright of the Typographical union No. 16 of Chicago, is reported to have recently said. "Every week dozens of jobless printers come to our relief committee for aid, medical and financial. Whisky is their trouble."

INCREASED TAXES.

When the saloonkeeper gets return on his investment, the taxpayer gets an increase in his assessment.

FARM STOCK.

The horses will soon be in heavy work. Harden their shoulders by a wash of salt and water.

Buy some sheep. April is a good month to get some good grades, and turn them loose on the corners and weedy pastures next summer.

The real stockman never permits the young pigs to stop growing for a moment.

Sheep are not found on enough farms, and it is the wonder why they are not.

A pig gives the best returns from dairy products while young. To work the colt until it is leg weary will develop a slow walker.

BREEDING EWES

FOR WINTER LAMBS

Ewes that are being prepared for early winter lambs should be allowed to exercise freely on a fairly large lot near their shelter, with a good main tenance ration of sound hay and plenty of fresh water. They want to be in prime condition when the early pasture is ready for them about May 1. To insure this they should be sheared early, about the middle of April, depending on the season. Before they are ready to breed it is a good practice to flush the ewes. This can be done in either of two ways—by feeding them

The Southdown is the generally accepted type of a mutton and short wool sheep. It has been the sire of all other so called Down breeds, crossed on various old fashioned races which had become obsolete. The Southdown is one of the most beautiful sheep; it has a smooth, even body, round, clean barrel, short legs and broad saddle. Its mutton has long been held in high favor, the meat being sweet, tender and never overfat. The sheep shown is a Southdown wether.

a heavy ration or turning them on fine pasture in May after they have been for the early part of the spring on bare lots and hay feed. This change in feeding seems to start their improvement in condition very swiftly and tends to bring them into breeding condition with considerable uniformity.

Give the ewes close attention and keep them in good condition. Their flesh should be solid, and they should be full of life and vigor. Fat is detrimental. Ewes that have had at least one lamb already are to be preferred. They have gained experience as mothers.

If on good pasture, but low in flesh, they should have a ration of a full pound per day of two-thirds oats and one-third of a mixture of bran and linseed meal. This feed should be given morning and night. Corn is too fattening, as is also alfalfa. A little good clean meadow or clover hay is good, but feed no timothy or rye at this time; also give the ram all he will clean up of these foods. Let the sheep have plenty of exercise and constant access to pure water and rock salt.

Breed the sheep about the 20th of June and, above all, keep them where they may be quiet and free from alarm. Avoid heavy feeding after conception till perhaps six weeks before lambing, when it may be renewed in moderation.

FOUND DEAD IN OAT FIELD

Death Suddenly Claims Henry Dixon, a Pioneer Resident.

Body Found by His Daughter a Few Minutes After Being Stricken With Heart Failure.

Henry Dixon, a prominent and well-known farmer of Marion township, was found dead in the oat field where he had been at work Monday afternoon about 4 o'clock.

Mr. Dixon was in the house at 3:30 in the afternoon, and shortly after this hour told his daughters he intended to go into the field and cradle some oats. He left the house and cradled across the field and part of the way back, and becoming tired, sat down for a short rest. Shortly afterward he resumed his work and had cradled about three rods, when he was stricken with heart failure, exclaiming where he stood. Within twenty minutes from the time he was stricken he was missed, and his daughter, Mable, went to the field to find out where he was, and found him lying on the ground dead. From a later examination of the body the verdict is that death came almost instantaneous.

Henry Dixon was born in Manitoba in 1851, and settled in Charlevoix county over 35 years ago. He first settled on what is known as the Miller farm, now owned by Louis Griner. He lived here some years and then moved to the old homestead, where he resided until about two years ago, when he bought the farm upon which he lived until death claimed him.

Mr. Dixon belonged to that hardy type of pioneers whose work in clearing up the country and converting it into the best of farm lands has made this section of Northern Michigan the beautiful place it is today. During the thirty-five years he has lived here he has filled various township, offices and was at all times willing to do anything asked of him for the good of the community. He is survived by his aged wife and eleven children—seven girls and four boys.

Funeral services will be held from the Apostolic Holiness church at Phelps on Friday afternoon at one o'clock, Rev. B. O. Shattuck, officiating.

Who Found It?

Will the person who found a package containing a linen table cloth and some napkins on or near the Wilbur Dock, please leave at the Hotel Michigan. A liberal reward will be given.—Adv. 3211.

Will Build New Theater

Rumor has it that steps are being taken toward the organization of a stock company whose intentions are to purchase a suitable site and erect a fine new building for a moving picture show and opera house. There is plenty of room in Charlevoix for an up-to-date, modern moving picture show—a building constructed especially for shows of this nature, with plenty of seating capacity, and arranged for the convenience of the public.

Who Does It Belong To?

If the person who left a rocking chair at my place of business some time ago for repairs does not call for it soon, it will be sold for charges. Adv. 3211. O. W. Smith.

Big Time at Traverse City.

Traverse City is making great preparations for a big home coming week, August 23 to 28. It is planned to make this event the climax of everything so far pulled off. There will be bands and amusements galore, along with the many amusing features that will be provided by a big carnival company. One day will be set aside for a barbecue. Notice their advertisement on another page.

Must be Stopped.

The party who has been taking flowers from the Soldiers' Cemetery is hereby warned to stop it at once, or prosecutions will follow. Cemetery Committee.

Indian Camp Meeting

The Indians have just closed the most successful Camp Meeting they have ever held. The preaching of the Rev. Moses Smith and the solo work by Mrs. Susan Greensky were the special features. The Indians are grateful to the Bay Shore orchestra, and to the merchants who assisted them.

The community have reason to be proud of the Godly Indians of Greensky Hill church.

SOME WEATHER THIS

Nothing Left But the Stair Carpet and That's a Running.

An exchange relates the following experience of some of the summer visitors in that vicinity. It might have happened there, but not in a real resort town like Charlevoix:

"You have doubtless read of the manner in which ship's furniture and cabin woodwork have been burned to keep the fire in desperate weather. That's nothing compared to what has been going on around our place. The coke gave out last Wednesday. Thursday we sacrificed two stepladders, three washtubs and flour bin and the lawn mower handle. The storm house which we had taken down kept us going Friday and Friday was a cheerful day. Saturday saw the last of the carpet sweeper, three brooms, five suit cases and three old-fashioned trunks, while we kept warm Sunday on the kitchen table, Webster's unabridged dictionary, Kipling's 'Plain Tales from the Hills,' and the ice box. We went visiting Monday and Tuesday we bade a last adieu to the snowshovel, the old hall clock, one folding bed and a complete set of Dickens' works. Help! We have nothing left but the dining room furniture and that about half belongs to the installment house."

A SUCCESS IN SPITE OF RAIN

$143.52 Result of Work on Flag Day
Last Saturday

Michigan Child Welfare League Receives Hearty Support of Citizens of Charlevoix.

The Flag Day conducted in Charlevoix last Saturday was a success in spite of the rain. The proceeds of the sale of flags was $143.52. The Flag Day was conducted by a local committee, Mrs. W. E. Hampton, chairman, Mrs. A. F. Bridge, secretary, Mrs. H. A. Nichols, Mrs. Lisle Shanahan, Mrs. S. A. Bush, Mrs. A. Coulter, Mrs. J. L. Crane, Mrs. W. J. Rachow, Mrs. H. S. Harsha and Mrs. Allan Wilkinson. These ladies were assisted by many young people who offered the flags for sale.

Mrs. Cora Lamping, general director of the league, and Mrs. Mildred B. Kennedy, superintendent of the league, who were in Charlevoix and arranged for the flag day and the Michigan Child Welfare League, wish to express their thanks and appreciation to every one who helped to make the day a success.

The Michigan Child Welfare League is incorporated, non-sectarian and is approved by the State board of Corrections and charities. The work of the league is supported entirely by voluntary gifts of the people, membership fees, and proceeds from tag day and flag day sales.

The funds collected were received by the finance committee, A. F. Bridge, W. J. Rachow, W. E. Hampton and Capt. O. E. Wilbur, and through them directed to the League.

The League wish to express their appreciation to the citizens and visitors in Charlevoix for their generous support of this work of giving a crippled boy or girl a chance to be better able physically to be self supporting.

All cases of defective children will be carefully investigated.

Headquarters of the Michigan Child Welfare League is 518 Chamber of Commerce, Detroit.

The New Ford Starter.

A great deal of interest is being taken in the new Ford Starter on exhibition by J. McCrorey. The principal question asked is "How can they afford to sell them for ten dollars." Well may you ask this question, for one look at this starter will convince you that it could easily be sold for twice the price. When these starters were put on the market in Detroit and Grand Rapids they sold like "hot cakes" and they can be seen now by the score everywhere. Guaranteed the life of a Ford car. You can't afford to be without one at the price. Ask for J. McCrorey at Hines Drug Store or write to Charlevoix. Adv. 3211

Auction Sale.

On page 8 of this issue will be found advertised the auction sale of Mrs. C. Blanchard, who lives six miles north of Charlevoix on the Petoskey Road. The usual list of farm implements and stock will be disposed of, which include a number of tools that have been used but one season. Sale will take place August 16 and commence at one o'clock, fast time. E. B. Wnd, Auctioneer. F. A. Butler, Clerk.

Elect Officers at Twenty-fourth Annual Convention at East Jordan Last Week

The twenty-fourth annual convention of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Charlevoix county was held in the Presbyterian church of East Jordan August fourth and fifth. Due to the rainy weather the attendance was very small, but all delegates present were active in their work and interested in the coming campaign for state-wide prohibition.

The programs as printed were carried out with but few changes and were both spirited and instructive. The president, Mrs. Gertrude Burdick of Charlevoix, added many enthusiastic glimpses of western temperance work as well as practical suggestions from the Harbor Springs Chautauqua. The Union regrets that Mrs. Burdick expects to make California her home in the future. Charlevoix county loses an active worker and California receives a good citizen.

The following officers were elected for the coming year: President, Mrs. S. J. Alcox, Charlevoix. Vice President, at large, Mrs. E. E. Hall, East Jordan. Corresponding Secretary, Mrs. Sarah Wilkinson, Charlevoix. Recording Secretary, May L. Stewart, East Jordan. Treasurer, Mrs. Cory, Boyne City.

The number of temperance workers has greatly increased during the past year and they stand ready to make Michigan a white ribbon state. Three cheers for Michigan dry in 1916!

ATTENDED FESTIVAL

Wildwood, Beaver Island, Growing in Popularity as Summer Resort.

Wildwood, Beaver Island, is growing along all lines, is the report from Miss Carrie Cole of this city, who on Saturday last accepted an invitation to a festival given by the "jolly club" of Wildwood.

At eight o'clock an immense crowd gathered in the large casino. Soon the entertainment committee, consisting of Mrs. McKnight, Mr. Rudolph Flick and Mrs. Reynolds announced that the pigeon walk would be introduced by Miss Minnie Cole and Mr. Wm. Ritchie, immediately after Mr. Jack Evans and Mrs. Rebekah Brow gave a fine illustration of the Virginia Reel. Music was furnished by the "Wildwood" orchestra.

At a late hour the crowd was served to a grand five-course dinner, in the immense dining room of "Seldom Inn." Toasts were given by the Hon. John Gallagher, Mrs. Brown, Mr. George Parcel and Mr. and Mrs. Garrett Cole. For a fine time Miss Cole suggests Wildwood, Beaver Island.

The County Fair.

"The county fair is coming back. The poster sheets are everywhere. And almost everybody now is whooping up the county fair. We've had our fill of acrobatics. We want to see the big fat hog. The patent churn, the trotting dog. The new device that beats a cog. And work around through the catalog. At the county fair.

We've always missed the county fair—its inner and its outer track, The dancing saddle, and the bull About four feet across the back. We're weary of awful war talk—We want to hear the whistles blow, The horses neigh, the roosters crow, The blooded cattle when they low, And the shrill-voiced starter shouting "Go!"

At the county fair.

it seems as if the world grows cold, And people nowadays don't care For other people in the warm Old manner of the county fair. We've tired of bowing here and there, We want to shout "How are you, Dan?" "Hello there, Bill!" and Howdy Ann. And get a warm clasp of the hand From every woman, child and man.

At the county fair.

"The county fair is coming back—And that is probably as well. A little more, and everyone Had disappeared within his shell, The good old plan was better far—We want to meet the human race In some well decorated place. And be right human for a space Because of coming face to face At the county fair."

RAINS DAMAGE WHEAT CROP

Also in Some Sections Cereal is Hard Hit by Hessian Fly.

Conditions Throughout State as Reported by Secretary of State Vaughan.

The average estimated yield per acre in the state is 18.51, in the southern counties 19.14, in the northern counties 15.92 and in the Upper Peninsula 20.55 bushels. In some sections of the state wheat has been injured by the Hessian fly but it is generally considered of very good quality, however, the recent heavy rains will undoubtedly cause some damage to the crop. The estimate at present indicates that the state yield will be about 14,500,000 bushels. The percent of plowing done for wheat is 10 in the state, southern and central counties and Upper Peninsula and 11 in the northern counties. The total number of bushels of wheat marketed by farmers in July is estimated at about 1,000,000 which indicates that the crop of 1914 has passed out of the possession of the producers. One hundred mills, elevators and grain dealers report no wheat marketed in July.

Rye—The average estimated yield per acre in the state is 14.66, in the southern counties 14.80, in the central counties 14.46, in the northern counties 13.61 and in the Upper Peninsula 20.24 bushels. According to the above estimate the state yield should be about 5,775,000 bushels.

Corn—The condition of corn as compared with an average is 74 in the state, southern and central counties and the Upper Peninsula and 73 in the northern counties. The condition one year ago was 89 in the state, 87 in the southern counties, 93 in the central counties, 91 in the northern counties and 96 in the Upper Peninsula.

Oats—The estimated average yield in the state is 36.82, in the southern counties 39.25, in the central counties 34.41, in the northern counties 33.55 and in the Upper Peninsula 35.77 bushels per acre. The above estimate indicates that the state yield will exceed 62,000,000 bushels.

Potatoes—The condition as compared with an average is 93 in the state, central and northern counties and 92 in the Upper Peninsula. The condition one year ago was 88 in the state, 84 in the southern counties, 91 in the central and northern counties, and 100 in the Upper Peninsula.

Beans—The condition of beans compared with an average per cent, is 89 in the state, 87 in the southern counties, 90 in the central counties, 92 in the northern counties and 85 in the Upper Peninsula. The condition one year ago was 88 in the state and southern counties, 89 in the central and northern counties and 95 in the Upper Peninsula.

Sugar Beets—The condition of sugar beets as compared with an average is 93 in the state, 94 in the southern and central counties and the Upper Peninsula, and 91 in the northern counties. The condition one year ago was 88 in the state, 93 in the southern counties, 82 in the central and northern counties and 100 in the Upper Peninsula.

Apples—This year is considered an off season for apples and pears and the prospects up to May 1st was 6 per cent less than on the corresponding date in 1914 but the severe frosts during the month of May did heavy damage to tree fruits in nearly all parts of the state, consequently the yield of apples will be considerably less than it was last year, especially winter varieties. The prospect for an average crop is 45 in the state, 54 in the southern counties, 35 in the central counties, 37 in the northern counties and 50 in the Upper Peninsula. One year ago the average was 71 in the state, 63 in the southern counties, 73 in the central counties, 80 in the northern counties and 88 in the Upper Peninsula.

CADDIES' EXCURSION SUNDAY

Will Make Trip to Beaver Island On the Steamer
City of Boyne.

The much anticipated event of the year among the caddies of the Charlevoix Golf Club will take place on Sunday next, when the Steamer City of Boyne will leave this city early in the morning with the "bunch" to spend the day on Beaver Island.

The boat will leave Charlevoix not later than seven o'clock and returning, leave the island in time to reach home by dark. Boys who are eligible to take in the trip are requested to be at the dock on time, and each bring his own drinking cup.

The picnic dinner will be a feature of the day, the expense of which, as well as that of the excursion, will be taken care of by contributions from the club and players.

The excursion is a recent feature of the management of the Golf Club, and is intended as a reward to the caddies for the service they have given. A number of association members will be present and the best of care taken of the boys. Caddy Master Ricaby is to be congratulated on the manner in which he has taken charge of the caddies during the past year. One thing he has insisted upon—order and good conduct—has greatly improved the caddy situation, and it is to be hoped that the good work along this line will be continued.

MOTHER KIDNAPS HER OWN CHILD

Mrs. Pearl Vogel Did Not Know She Had Legally Given it Away.

Claims She Did Not Know the Intent of Legal Papers When She Signed Them.

One of the most pitiful cases which has been brought into the local courts was heard Saturday when Pearl Vogel was brought before Justice Hammond on a charge of abduction. She waived examination and was taken to Charlevoix by Prosecutor Lewis. She will doubtless plead guilty and be freed on probation.

The mother, a mere girl in years, was persuaded to sign papers some time ago which gave her two-year-old daughter to a neighbor family. It is alleged they had some hold upon the girl-wife and were able to scare her into doing their bidding. The mother claims she did not know she was legally giving the child away and later made an effort to get the baby back. This was refused and Friday morning she hired an automobile, went to the foster-parents' home and stole the child. Driving to Alanson she caught a north bound train and got as far as Mackinaw, where Deputy Houghton arrested her and brought her back.

The sympathies of the officers aroused, she was afforded every courtesy but she was clearly a law breaker and had to appear on the charge.

It is thought likely a legal fight will ensue to regain possession of the child, although the mother is without funds to promote such a fight.—Boyne City Journal.

ALL DEEDS MUST BE RECORDED

Many Changes in Law Which Goes Into Effect Monday.

Last Legislature Made Amendments That Affects
All Kinds of Conveyancing.

Among the new laws and amendments going into effect August 15, 1915, are a number of changes with reference to deeds and mortgages. The following are especially pointed out by Register of Deeds R. A. Emrey:

All instruments conveying or mortgaging real estate or any interest therein, hereafter executed, shall state whether or not the male grantors, mortgagors or other parties, executing the same are married or single. Unless this provision is complied with, the register of deeds is forbidden to receive such instrument for record.

There are also many changes relative to chattel mortgages. Every mortgage or conveyance intended to operate as a mortgage, when not accompanied by an immediate delivery and followed by an actual and continued change in possession shall be void as against the creditors of the mortgagor unless the mortgage or a true copy thereof is filed with the clerk of the township or city where the property is located, and also where the mortgagor resides; when the mortgagor is a non-resident of the state the mortgage or true copy must be filed with the clerk of the township or city where the property is located. An affidavit declaring it to be an actual and bona fide transaction, otherwise the clerk cannot accept it for record. There is an additional provision governing the mortgaging of a stock of merchandise or merchandise and fixtures or any part thereof purchased for resale at retail. Such instrument or a true copy together with the affidavit, shall also be filed with the county register of deeds of the county where the goods and chattels are located.

Wherever a chattel mortgage or a true copy is presented for record to the register of deeds, city or township clerk, such officer shall endorse thereon the time of receiving same and to deposit same in his office for the inspection of all persons interested. These officers shall also enter in a book provided by him for that purpose, the names of all the parties to such instruments, arranging the names alphabetically and shall note therein the time of filing.

Such mortgage shall be void as against creditors of the parties making same within one year after day of filing, unless within thirty days next preceding the expiration of the year the mortgagee, his agent or attorney file an affidavit setting forth his interest in the property.

There is also a new provision relative to unrecorded conveyances. Every conveyance of real estate in this state hereafter made, must be recorded with the proper officer or it becomes "void as against any subsequent purchaser in good faith and for a valuable consideration, of the same real estate or any portion thereof, whose conveyance shall be first duly recorded. The fact that such first recorded conveyance is in the form or contains the terms of a deed of quit-claim and release shall not affect the question of good faith of such subsequent purchaser, or be of itself notice to him of any unrecorded conveyance of the same real estate or any part thereof."

WOMEN'S WOES

Charlevoix Women Are Finding Relief at last.

It does seem that women have more than a fair share of the aches and pains that afflict humanity; they must "keep up," must attend to duties in spite of constantly aching backs, or headaches, dizzy spells, bearing-down pains; they must stoop over, when to stoop means torture. They must walk and bend and work with racking pains and many aches from kidney ills. Keeping the kidneys well has spared thousands of women much misery. Read of a remedy for kidneys only that is endorsed by people in this locality.

Mrs. J. Sheridan, 513 Emmet St., Potoskey, Mich., says "I have used Doan's Kidney Pills for distressing backache and other kidney troubles and have been greatly benefited. I was subject to spells of nervousness, accompanied by headaches. Doan's Kidney Pills have given me splendid results. Other members of my family have used this medicine with good results."

MAKING BEST OF DIRT HIGHWAYS

Many Communities Unable to Maintain Other Roads.

THE GRADER AND DRAG.

The Trouble With the Good Road Movement is That in Many Communities It Gets Mixed Up in the Minds of Taxpayers With the Motor Speedway.

The trouble with the good road movement in nine out of ten neighborhoods is that it gets mixed up in the minds of the taxpayers with the motor speedway and the trail of the joy rider, says a contributor to the Farm Progress. A good many farmers are getting automobiles and more farmers will get them in the future, but even this has failed to do much toward removing the prejudice against the building of permanent roads.

There are some communities that are financially able to build the wide, permanent, brick, concrete or macadam roadways. Most communities are not able to assume such a burden. The dirt road is about the best we can look forward to, despite the statements of the radical road builders. We do not care to tax ourselves to death at the present time, and we dislike to hand our backs to the burden of paying off a series of road bonds maturing at the end of twenty or thirty years and at the same time keeping up and maintaining the splendid but costly roads.

Therefore a great many of the plain people, those who suffer most from bad roads, are in favor of settling about the task of doing the best we can with the dirt highways. We would like the sort of a road that machines could travel over twelve months in the year, but feeling that these are out of our reach we are going to do the best we can with what we have and hope for the days when federal and state aid will really amount to something. This means that we are taking a great deal more interest in the building, repair and dragging of the one too good highways that we now have.

Certainly a great deal can be done by the community that makes up its mind to help keep the roads in good shape. One man in a district can, by dragging the trails, make the difference easily seen. I was in northwest Missouri for a week in the fall of 1914, and saw work being done that should be copied.

I was visiting a man, who lived three and a half miles from town, and he, his sons or some one of his hired men spent a part of a day dragging the roads every week. They did not wait for the "road boss" to "warn" everybody out for a "road working," but whenever they found that they had an hour or two of time that could be spared they hitched up to a road drag of the D. Ward King pattern and smoothed some of the humps off the highway. Sunshine or freezing made but little difference on these roads that were being steadily worked down twelve months in the year. That is the kind of work that will count, particularly where you can get a whole neighborhood interested.

By the use of the grader in autumn and spring and the road drag in fall, winter, spring and summer we can put the surfaces of these dirt roads in such shape that they will be reasonably passable all the year round. Then we ought to turn our attention to narrowing the actual roadway down to a track of not more than sixteen feet in width. What is the use of working, grading and dragging it full thirty foot width of track? I have an idea who is responsible for the idea that a country highway ought to have a sixty foot right of way, but whoever he was he made a sad and costly mistake. We will be forced to pay more attention also to bridges and culvert work. It is remarkable to see how easily the public money can be wasted in this item.

By making the most of our present roads and resources we may possibly get to a point where we can build more permanently. At least we should not give up all hope simply because we cannot have the very best thing in permanent highways.

The Economy.

PEG O' MY HEART

By J. Hartley Manners

A Comedy of Youth Founded by Mr. Manners on His Great Play of the Same Title—Illustrations From Photographs of the Play

Copyright, 1913, by Dodd, Mead & Company

SYNOPSIS.

Frank O'Connell, young Irish patriot, is shot and wounded by British soldiers while making a home rule speech. He is aided by Angela Kingsnorth, an English society girl, who defends him.

Angela takes O'Connell to her brother's home and helps to nurse him. He recovers, and he and the girl become fast friends.

O'Connell when well is sent to jail for disturbing the peace. He finally writes Angela that he has finished his sentence.

O'Connell and Angela wed, and she espoused the Irish cause. Her brother, a member of parliament, is very angry.

The happy couple come to America to live. A daughter is born to them. Angela's brother refuses to help the couple in any way. Angela dies.

O'Connell names his daughter Margaret and calls her "Peg." O'Connell receives a most important letter from England, which perplexes him.

O'Connell allows Peg to visit England at her uncle's request. The elder Kingsnorth's heart had finally softened toward his dead sister's little girl.

Peg goes to the home of the Chichester family in England at the direction of Mr. Hawkes, Kingsnorth's attorney, as Kingsnorth suddenly dies.

CHAPTER XII.

Ethel and Brent.

ETHEL dropped her gaze from his face and said, with the suspicion of a smile playing around her lips:

"If you had the right to make love to me straightforwardly—you wouldn't do it."

He looked at her in amazement.

"What do you mean?" he gasped.

"It's only because you haven't the right that you do it—by suggestion."

Ethel pursued.

"How can you say that?" And he put all the heart he was capable of into the question.

"You don't deny it," she said quietly.

He breathed hard and then said bitterly:

"What a contemptible opinion you must have of me!"

"Then we're quits, aren't we?"

"How?" he asked.

"Have you any one of me?"

"You? Why, Ethel?"

"Surely every married man must have a contemptible opinion of the woman he covertly makes love to. If he hadn't he couldn't do it, could he?"

Once again she leveled her cold, impassive eyes on Brent's flushed face.

"I don't follow you," was all Brent said.

"Haven't you had time to think of an answer?"

"I don't know what you're driving at," he added.

Ethel smiled her most enigmatical smile.

"No? I think you do." She waited a moment. Brent said nothing. This was a new mood of Ethel's. It baffled him.

Presently she relieved the silence by asking him:

"What happened last night?"

He hesitated. Then he answered:

"I'd rather not say. I'd sound like a cad blaming a woman."

"Never mind how it sounds. Tell it. It must have been amusing."

"Amusing!" He bent over her again.

"Oh, the more I look at you and listen to you the more I realize I should never have married."

"Why did you?" came the cool question.

Brent answered with all the power at his command. Here was the moment to lay his heart bare that Ethel might see.

"Have you ever seen a young hare, fresh from its kind, run headlong into a snare? Have you ever seen a young man free of the trammels of college dash into a net? I did! I wasn't tryp wise."

He paced the room restlessly, all the self pity rising in him. He went on:

"Heavens, what nurslings we are when we first feel our feet! We're like children just loose from the leading strings. Anything that glitters catches us. Every trap that is set for our unwary feet we drop into. I did—dropped in, caught hand and foot, mind and soul."

"Soul?" queried Ethel, with a note of doubt.

"Yes," he answered.

"Don't you mean body?" she suggested.

"Body, mind and soul!" he said, with an air of finality.

"Well, body anyway," nodded up Ethel.

"And for what?" he went on. "For what? Love! Compensations! That is what we build on in marriage. And what did I realize? Hate and wrangling; wrangling, just as the common herd, with no advantages, wrangle and make it a part of their lives, the zest to their union. It's been my curse."

"Why wrangling?" drawled Ethel.

"She didn't understand."

"You?" asked Ethel, in surprise.

"My thoughts, my actions!"

"You mean you would?"

"Probably."

"I'm sure of it." He tried to take her hand. She drew it away and settled herself comfortably to listen again:

"Tell me more about your wife."

"The slightest attention shown to any other woman meant a ridiculous, a humiliating scene."

"Humiliating?"

"Aren't doubt and suspicion humiliating?"

"They would be a compliment in some cases."

"How?"

"They would put a fictitious value on some men."

"You couldn't humiliate in that way," he ventured slowly.

"No. I don't think I could. If a man showed a preference for any other woman she would be quite welcome to him."

"No man could," said Brent indignantly.

She looked at him coldly a moment.

"Let me see—where were you? Just married, weren't you? Go on."

"Then came the baby." He said that with a significant meaning and paused to see the effect on Ethel. If it had any Ethel effectually conceded it. Her only comment was:

"Ah!"

Brent went on:

"One would think that would change things. But no. Neither of us wanted her. Neither of us loved her. Child born should come of love, not hate. And she is a child of hate." He paused, looking intently at Ethel. She looked understandingly at him, then dropped her eyes.

Brent went on as if following up an advantage: "She sits in her little chair, her small, wrinkled, old, disfigured face turned to us, with the eye watching us, accusingly. She submits to caresses as though they were distasteful, as if she knew they were lies. At times she pushes the nursing face away with her little baby fingers." He stopped, watching her eagerly. Her eyes went down.

"I shouldn't tell you this. It's terrible. I see it in your face. What are you thinking?"

"I'm sorry," replied Ethel simply.

"For me?"

"For your wife."

"My wife?" he repeated, aghast.

"Yes," said Ethel. "Aren't you? No? Are you just sorry for yourself?"

Brent turned impatiently away. So this laying open the wound in his life was nothing to Ethel. Instead of pity for him, all it engendered in her was sorrow for his wife.

How little women understood him!

There was a pathetic catch in his voice as he turned to Ethel and said reproachfully:

"You think me purely selfish?"

"Naturally," she answered quickly.

"I am. Why not be truthful about ourselves sometimes? Eh?"

"You quarreled last night—about you!" he said desperately.

"Really?"

"Gossip has linked us together. My wife has heard it and put the worst construction on it."

"Well?"

"We said things to each other last night that can never be forgiven or forgotten. I left the house and walked the streets—hours! I looked my whole life back and through as though it were some stranger's." He turned ab-

He impulsively stretched out his arms, embracing her.

ruptly away to the windows and stared a moment, looking down the drive.

Ethel said nothing.

He came back to her in a few moments.

"I tell you we ought to be taught—we ought to be taught, when we are young, what marriage really means, just as we are taught not to steal, nor lie, nor sin. In marriage we do all three—when we're ill matched. We steal affection from some one else, we lie in our lives, and we sin in our relationship."

Ethel asked him very quietly:

"Do you mean that you are a sinner, a thief and a liar?"

Brent looked at her in horror.

"Oh, take some of the blame!" said Ethel. "Don't put it all on the woman."

"You've never spoken to me like this before."

"I've often wanted to," replied Ethel; then she asked him, "What do you intend doing?"

"Separate," he answered eagerly.

"You don't doctor a poisoned limb when your life depends on it; you cut it off. When two lives generate a deadly poison, face the problem as a surgeon would—amputate."

"And after the operation—what then?" asked Ethel.

"That is why I am here facing you. Do you understand what I mean?"

"Oh, dear, yes—perfectly! I have been waiting for you to get to the point."

"Ethel!" and he impulsively stretched out his arms, embracing her.

She drew back slightly, just out of his reach.

"Wait!" She looked up at him quizzically. "Suppose we generate poison? What would you do—amputate me?"

"You are different from all other women."

"Didn't you tell your wife that when you asked her to marry you?"

He turned away impatiently. "Don't say those things, Ethel; they hurt."

"I'm afraid, Christian, I'm too frank. Am I not?"

"You stand alone, Ethel. You seem to look into the hearts of people and know why and how they beat."

"I do—sometimes. It's an awkward faculty."

He looked at her glowingly. "How marvelously different two women can be! You—my wife!"

Ethel shook her head and smiled her calm, dead smile: "We're not really very different, Christian. Only come natures like change. Yours does. And the new have all the virtues. Why, I might not last as long as your wife did."

"Don't say that. We have a common bond—understanding."

"Thank so!"

"I understand you."

"I wonder."

"You do me."

"Yes—that is just the difficulty."

"I tell you I am at the crossroads. The finger board points the way to me distinctly."

"Does it?"

"It does." He leaned across to her.

"Would you risk it?"

"What?" she asked.

"I'll hide nothing. I'll put it all before you—the snubs of your friends; the whisper of a scandal that would grow into a roar; afraid to open a newspaper, fearing what might be printed in it; life at first in some little continental village, dreading the passers through, keeping out of sight lest they should recognize one. No. It wouldn't be fair to you."

Ethel thought a moment, then answered slowly:

"No, Chris, I don't think it would."

"You see I am a cad—just a selfish cad!"

"Aren't you?" and she smiled up at him.

"I'll never speak of this again. I would have spoken now—only—I'm distracted—completely distracted. Will you forgive me for speaking as I did?"

"Certainly," said Ethel. "I'm not offended. On the contrary. Anyway, I'll think it over and let you know."

"You will, really?" he asked greedily, grasping at the straw of a hope. "You will really think it over?"

"I will, really."

"And when she sets me free," he went on, "we could, we could"—He suddenly stopped.

She looked coolly at him as he hesitated and said, "It is a difficult little word at times, isn't it?"

"Would you marry me?" he asked, with a supreme effort.

"I never cross my bridges until I come to them," said Ethel languidly.

"And we're such a long way from that one, aren't we?"

"Then I am to wait?"

"Yes; do," she replied.

CHAPTER XIII.

An Unexpected Arrival.

"IS all your money gone?" Brent asked Ethel.

"I think so."

"Good heavens!"

"Dear mamma knows as little about business as she does about me. Until this morning she has always had a rooted belief in her bank and her daughter. If I bolt with you her last cherished illusion will be destroyed."

"Let me help you," he said eagerly.

"How?" And she looked at him again with that cold, hard scrutiny.

"Lend us money, do you mean?"

He fell into the trap.

"Yes," he said. "I'd do that if you'd let me."

She gave just the suggestion of a sneer and turned deliberately away.

He felt the force of the unspoken reproach.

"I beg your pardon," he said humbly.

She went on as if she had not heard the offensive suggestion, "So you see we're both in a way, at the crossroads."

He seized her hand fiercely. "Let me take you away out of it all," he cried.

She withdrew her hand slowly.

"No," she said, "not just now. I'm not in a boiling mood today."

He moved away. She watched him. Then she called him to her. Some thing in the man attracted this strange nature. She could not analyze or define the attraction. But the impelling force was there.

He went to her.

Ethel spoke to him for the first time softly, almost caressingly.

During the year 1913, according to the Michigan Monthly Bulletin of Vital Statistics, there was reported from Charlevoix county 467 births, 223 deaths 174 marriages and 31 divorces. The birth rate for the county for the year is 22.7 and death rate 10.8.

Mr. and Mrs. Robert Jones of Detroit, former and well known residents of Charlevoix, arrived in the city Tuesday for a short visit among friends and relatives. They will also visit at Beaver Island and St. Joseph before returning to their home in Detroit.

Why you should trade with firms that advertise. Because advertising moves goods, thus assuring you that the firm that advertises is least likely to have anything old to offer you, even were it so minded. Because the firm that advertises to sell is likely to be just as progressive in buying its stock, and thus knows how to purchase at a saving to his customers.

Every night since the Masonic Fair opened has seen a marked increase in attendance. The hall is tastefully decorated and the visitor will find booths of every description throughout the entire building. Various forms of amusement have been provided and those who have attended speak highly on the manner in which the fair is being conducted.

The Northern Michigan Holiness Camp Meeting Association will hold a camp meeting at Boyne City from August 13 to August 22, inclusive. The meeting will be interdenominational and stands for Bible holiness as taught by Rev. John Wesley and the early fathers of the church. Among the workers will be Rev. E. E. Wood of Lansing, Rev. Chas. A. Strait and wife of Boyne City, Rev. B. O. Shattuck of Ellsworth and others. The public is extended a cordial invitation to attend.

A well-known Petoskey young man who has been in the habit of going to see Charlevoix, came near having his head cut off the other night while passing through a back yard he ran foul of the clothes line. Someone has suggested that while in Charlevoix Petoskey young men stick to the main streets, as clothes lines are dangerous weapons. — Petoskey Evening News. This is the first instance that has come to our notice where young men, either from Petoskey, other neighboring cities, or home products were obliged to cross back yards to interview any individual they wanted to see, nor do we believe it is necessary to do this in any event. If the above is true, and it is necessary for the above mentioned young man to cross the back yard to see his friend, it would be far better if he remained in his home town until he is a welcome visitor at the front door.

POULTRY and EGGS

DUCK GROWING PAYS.

When Judiciously Fed Birds Are Ready For Market In Ten Weeks.

The first feed for ducklings is made of equal parts bran, cornmeal and shorts, to which is added 5 per cent of beef scrap. It is fed moistened five times a day all they will eat for the first three weeks and after that only three times a day. Some grit or sharp sand is added to this mash occasionally. From the very first some green food should be cut up fine and mixed with it gradually increasing the quantity until half the bulk is green food. An abundance of good, clean, drinking water must be provided, but a pond of running water is not necessary, as ducks can be grown just as well without it. Plenty of shade should be provided, as ducks cannot stand the hot rays of the sun.

Judicious feeding and forcing will bring ducks to weigh from eight to twelve pounds per pair at ten weeks of age. Probably Ludlow Runners are the best breed to raise, as they are good layers, producing a white, mild flavored egg, and the ducklings make rapid and economical gains.

It is generally supposed that more grain is required to grow a pound of duck than to produce a pound of chicken, but this is not the case, as carefully conducted experiments show that it takes from 3.25 pounds to 3.75 pounds of grain to produce one pound of chicken, whereas it takes only about 3.15 pounds of grain to produce one pound of duck.

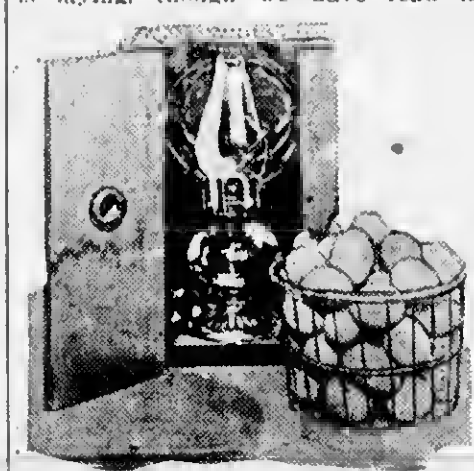

We do not advocate extensive duck growing for the average farmer, but we do say that fifty to a hundred ducks can be raised on almost every farm at a handsome profit. — Kansas Yearbook.

EGGS FOR HATCHING.

Temperature at Which to Hold Them Until Ready For Incubator.

Were it possible we would prefer not to keep eggs for hatching at all, but to incubate them the day they were laid, writes a correspondent of the National Stockman. I believe there is no better way than to incubate nature as closely as we can in all branches of the poultry industry. It is natural for the hen to lay her first clutch of eggs in April or May or possibly June. At that time the weather is usually quite mild—that is, we rarely have any freezing temperature.

The hen does not seem to worry much about the weather. She makes her nest in a secluded, well protected spot and leaves it as soon as she deposits her eggs. I have never been able to detect a hen turning or shuffling her eggs during the period when she is laying, though we have read in Breaking eggs to detect infertility is poor policy. The simple egg detector illustrated will tell at a glance whether an egg is fit to be put into the incubator. An egg when newly laid is full and clean except the yolk shadow. The egg detector should be black in color with a lamp and reflector, the reflector being opposite the aperture against which the egg is held. In testing an egg the presence of a large air cell indicates that it is not fresh and is unfit for incubating purposes.

many places that we must turn the eggs daily to insure fertility and hatchability.

For the best results we should keep eggs intended for incubation in a place where there is the least possible chance for evaporation to take place. I have had the best results from eggs kept in a temperature with a maximum of 50 degrees and a minimum of 40 degrees. A room where there is little or no artificial heat, where the temperature does not fall below 40 degrees or rise above 50 degrees and where the conditions are such that the evaporation will take place, is the ideal place to keep eggs for hatching. Well fertilized eggs will hatch successfully if kept fifteen to twenty days after being laid. A common market basket bedded down with paper and a woolen cloth spread over the contents, care in handling and a slight movement of the eggs two or three times per week will make conditions favorable toward perfect incubation. We must not forget, however, that behind all we must have well fed, vigorous, healthy breeding stock.

Water For Turkeys.

Turkeys drink more than chickens, so don't forget their watering pans. Some people believed that a poult should not be given water the first three or four days of its life because they so often notice the turkey den pushing them back from water in a stream. She is quite likely ordering them back until she investigates.

How Time, Is Often Damaged.

Experiments at the forest service laboratory of the department of agriculture have determined that the strength of a piece of wood may be seriously impaired by slight compression failures due to rough handling, says the Science American. Dampness and heat causes a slight cause a compression failure at the point at which the beam strikes the skid, and it will be at this point that the beam gives way when it breaks under a strain too severe for the weakened fibers to withstand. (Hilbert) unaccountable breakage in hickory wagon spokes and other presumably strong materials is now attributed to compression failures caused by windstorms in the period of growth or by hard usage in lumbering and manufacturing processes. These compression failures show themselves in the form of little diagonal streaks or wrinkles across the grain and are always a sure sign of weakness.

Silencer For Motor Engines.

Built on the same principle as a gun silencer, a device which eliminates the engine noise of light motor cars and makes their action as quiet as more expensive machines has been produced, says Popular Mechanics. It replaces the ordinary muffler and is claimed to lessen the back pressure caused by the resistance of exhaust gases, thereby adding power and decreasing fuel consumption.

The arrangement consists of a series of chambers in which the gases are made to revolve rapidly after they leave the expansion chamber. The sound waves are broken and turned into a rotary motion, passing gradually from one chamber to the other until dissipated. In this manner both the sound of the gas explosion and the noise caused by rapid passage of gas through an exhaust pipe into the atmosphere are lessened. The appliance is simply constructed and may be attached to a car in a few minutes.

Triplex Glass Much Used.

Triplex glass, which created a good deal of comment when it was first announced a year ago, is now appearing on the market in many forms, especially in Great Britain, where it has caught the fancy of motorists. The glass is made into laminated windows, wind shields, etc. It consists, says the Scientific American, of two sheets of thin glass with a thin sheet of cellophane between them, the whole three sheets being combined by glucose and hydraulic pressure into a homogeneous mass. It cannot be shattered into splinters by any agency. It will crack and break under hammer blows, but no splinters will fly, endangering people.

anger or disgust or fear. As she put him away from her she just said simply: "Please don't. It's so hot this morning."

As she turned away from him she was struck dumb. Sitting beside the table in the middle of the room, her back turned to them, was the strangest, oddest little figure Ethel had ever seen. Who was she? How long had she been in the room?

Ethel turned to Brent. He was quite pale now and was nervously stroking his slight mustache.

Ethel was furious. It was incredible that Brent could have been so indiscreet.

How on earth did that creature get there without their hearing or seeing her?

Ethel went straight to the demure little figure sitting on the chair.

Peg's journey to England was one of the unappetizing memories of her life. She undertook the voyage deliberately to please her father, because he told her it would please him. But beneath this feeling of pleasing him was one of sulky resentment at being made to separate from him.

She planned all kinds of reprisals upon the unfortunate people she was going among. She would be so rude to them and so unbecomingly that they would be glad to see her back in the next boat. She schemed out her whole plan of action. She would contradict and disobey and be rude and hostile. Nothing they would do would be right to her, and nothing she would do or say would be right to them. She took infinite pleasure in her plan of campaign. Then, when she was enjoying the pleasure of such resentful dreams, she would think of her father waiting for news of her, of his pride in her, of how much he wanted her to succeed. She would realize how much the parting meant to him, and all her little plots would tumble down, and she would resolve to try to please her relations, learn all she could, succeed beyond all expression and either go back to America prosperous or send for her father to join her in England. All her dreams had her father either centrifugally or centripetally beating through them.

She refused all advances of friendship aboard ship. No one dared speak to her. She wanted to be alone in her stateroom. She and Michael would romp on the lower deck by favor of one of the seamen, who would keep a sharp lookout for officers.

This seaman—O'Farrell by name—took quite a liking to Peg and the dog and did many little kindly, gracious acts to minister to the comfort of both of them. He warned her that they would not let Michael go with her from the dock until he had first been quarantined. This hurt Peg more than anything could. She burst into tears. To have Michael taken from her would be the last misfortune. She would, indeed, be alone in that strange country. She was inconsolable.

O'Farrell at last took it on himself to get the dog ashore. He would wrap him up in some sailcloth, and then he would carry Michael outside the gates when the customs authorities had examined her few belongings.

When they reached Liverpool O'Farrell was as good as his word. Though many were the anxious moments they had as one or other of the customs officers would eye the suspicious package O'Farrell carried so carelessly under his arm.

At the dock a distinguished looking gentleman came on board and after some considerable difficulty succeeded in locating Peg. He was a well-dressed, soft speaking, vigorous man of forty-five. He inspired Peg with an instant dislike by his somewhat authoritative and pompous manner. He introduced himself as Mr. Montgomery Hawkes, the legal advisor for the Kingsnorth estate, and at once proceeded to take charge of Peg as a matter of course.

Poor Peg felt ashamed of her poor little bag, containing just a few changes of apparel, and her little paper bundle. She was mortified when she walked down the gangway with the prosperous looking lawyer while extravagantly dressed people with piles of luggage dashed here and there endeavoring to get it examined.

But Mr. Hawkes did not appear to notice Peg's shabbiness. On the contrary, he treated her and her belongings as though she were the most fashionable of fine ladies and her wardrobe the most complete.

Outside the gates she found O'Farrell waiting for her, with the precious Michael struggling to free himself from his coverings. Hawkes soon had a cab alongside. He helped Peg into it then she stretched out her arms, and O'Farrell opened the sailcloth, and out sprang Michael, dusty and dirty and bleary-eyed, but oh, such a happy, fussy, affectionate, relieved little animal when he saw his beloved owner waiting for him. He made one spring at her, much to the lawyer's discomfiture, and began to bark at her and lick her face and hands and jump on and roll over and over upon Peg in an excess of joy at his release.

Peg offered O'Farrell an American dollar. She had very little left. O'Farrell indignantly refused to take it.

"Oh, but ye must, indeed ye must!" cried Peg in distress. "Sure I won't be any tonight if ye don't. But for you poor Michael here might have been on that place ye spoke of—that quarantine, whatever it is. Ye saved him from that. And don't despise it because it's an American dollar. Sure it has a value all over the world. And, besides, I have no English money."

Poor Peg pleaded that O'Farrell should take it. He had been so nice to her all the way over.

Hawkes interposed skillfully, gave O'Farrell 5 shillings, thanked him warmly for his kindness to Peg and her dog, returned the dollar to Peg, let her say good-bye to the kindly sailor, told the cabman to drive to a certain railway station, and in a few seconds they were bowling along and Peg had entered a new country and a new life. They reached the railway station, and Hawkes procured tickets, and in half an hour they were on a train bound for the north of England.

During the journey Hawkes volunteered no information. He bought her papers and magazines and offered her lunch. This Peg refused. She said the ship had not agreed with her. She did not think she would want food for a long time to come.

After awhile, tired out with the rush and excitement of the ship's arrival, Peg fell asleep.

In a few hours they reached their destination. Hawkes woke her and told her she was at her journey's end. He again pulled a cab, told the driver where to go and got in with Peg, Michael and her luggage. In the cab he handed Peg a card and told her to go to the address written on it and ask the people there to allow her to wait until he joined her. He had a business call to make in the town. He would be as short a time as possible. She was just to tell the people that she had been asked to call there and wait.

After the cab had gone through a few streets it stopped before a big building. Hawkes got out, told the cabman where to take Peg, paid him, and with some final admonitions to Peg, disappeared through the swing doors of the town hall.

The cabman took the wondering Peg along until he drove up to a very handsome Elizabethan house. There he stopped. Peg looked at the name on the gateposts and then at the name on the end of Mr. Hawkes had given her. They were the same. Once more she gathered up her belongings and her dog and passed in through the gateposts and wandered up the long drive on a tour of inspection. She walked through the paths dividing rose beds until she came to some open windows. The main entrance hall of the house seemed to be hidden away somewhere amid the tall old trees.

Peg made straight for the open windows and walked into the most wonderful looking room she had ever seen. Everything in it was old and massive. It bespoke centuries gone by in every detail. Peg held her breath as she looked around her. Pictures and tapestries stared at her from the walls. Beautiful old cases were arranged in niches. The carpet was deep and soft and stifled all sound. Peg almost gave an ejaculation of surprise at the wonders of the room, when she suddenly became conscious that she was not alone in the room, that others were there and that they were talking.

She looked in the direction the sounds came from and saw, to her astonishment, a man with a woman in his arms. He was speaking to her in a most ardent manner. They were partially concealed by some statuary.

Peg coincided at once that she had intruded on some marital scene at which she was not desired, so she instantly sat down with her back to them.

She tried not to listen, but some of the words came distinctly to her. Just as she was becoming very uncomfortable and had half made up her mind to leave the room and find somewhere else to wait she suddenly heard herself addressed and in no uncertain tone of voice. There were indignation, surprise and anger in Ethel's question: "How long have you been here?"

Peg turned around and saw a strikingly handsome, beautifully dressed young lady glaring down at her. Her manner was haughty in the extreme. Peg felt most unhappy as she looked at her and did not know what to do.

A LECTURE ON CHRISTIAN SCIENCE

At Charlevoix Theatre, Sunday, August 8th, 1915.

BY GEORGE SHAW COOK, C. S. B.

Member of the Christian Science Board of Lectureship of the First Church of Christ, Scientist, Boston, Mass.

George Shaw Cook, C. S. B., of Chicago, Illinois, a member of the Christian Science Board of Lectureship, delivered a lecture on Sunday afternoon, August 8th, on "Christian Science" under the auspices of the Christian Science Society of this city in the Charlevoix Theatre.

Dr. F. H. Wilkinson introduced the lecturer. Dr. Wilkinson said:

FRIENDS:—Every new discovery along religious or philosophic lines, which is revolutionary in its nature and tends to set aside preconceived ideas, has met with opposition at its inception. The more revolutionary it is, the greater the opposition. When Galileo made the statement that the earth was round, he was thrown into prison; when Socrates declared that man was immortal and had a larger and more expansive life beyond the grave, he was made to drink the poison hemlock because he was corrupting the youth of Athens; when Jesus taught and healed the common people contrary to the generally accepted orthodox standard, he was put to death. A little less than half a century ago Mr. Eddy rediscovered this principle of divine healing and named her discovery Christian Science. At first her teachings and demonstrations over physical ills met with banter and ridicule, and later with violent opposition; but now, after a lapse of less than fifty years, the heaven of truth has been working and there is hardly a city or town of any size in the country without its Christian Science organization, while thousands are daily testifying to its efficacy in better health and morals and rejuvenated lives.

The Mother Church, the First Church of Christ, Scientist, of Boston, Massachusetts, maintains a board of lectureship whose duty is to give the public the true statement of Christian Science and to proclaim the gospel of "On Earth Peace, Good Will to Men."

We have with us this afternoon one of the members of the board of lectureship of the mother church, the First Church of Christ, Scientist, in Boston, Massachusetts, who is well and thoroughly qualified to elucidate the subject of Christian Science, and with great pleasure I now present to you Mr. George Shaw Cook of Chicago, Illinois.

Mr. Cook said:

Member of the Board of Lectureship of the Mother Church, the First Church of Christ, Scientist, in Boston, Mass.

Upon first hearing of Christian Science one will quite naturally inquire: "What does it promise to do for me?" "Does it promise to heal me of disease, and to save me from sin?" "Will it give success to my sorrow, and lift from me the burden of care?" "Can it break for me the spell of poverty, ill-reputation, and fear?" "Is it able to say to the seething waves of mortal sin, 'Be still!'"

PROMISES AND THEIR FULFILLMENT.

Those who have become acquainted with Christian Science in its application to human needs are able to assure the inquirer that it does all of these and more. Unnumbered thousands are bearing grateful witness to the fact that they have felt the beneficent touch of Christian Science in their lives and because of it they are being redeemed from the ills to which flesh is heir. Weekly in the Wednesday evening meetings of Christian Science churches testimony is being given to the healing and redemptive power of Christian Science. Week after week, month after month, and year after year, a never ending, uninterrupted stream of reliable evidence of the healing power of truth is going out to the world through the Christian Science periodicals. In these ways, and in other ways, the suffering, the sinning and the sorrowing are coming to know that there is "Heaven in Gilead."

Unmistakable and irrefutable proof is to be found on every hand of the power of spiritual truth to destroy human error. Any earnest seeker may with comparatively little effort learn that through Christian Science his fellow men have been thoroughly and permanently healed of chronic and acute disease by spiritual means without the use of material remedies. He will learn as the result of investigation that these cases of healing by scientific, mental treatment include many diseases ordinarily considered incurable. He will find that those numbered among the beneficiaries of Christian Science have been healed not merely of so-called functional and nervous troubles, but in many instances of those considered organic. He will ascertain that frequently these cases have been pronounced organic and incurable by reputable physicians, but that notwithstanding such pronouncement they have been healed perfectly and often quickly by Christian Science treatment. He will find that sometimes physicians are quite willing to give Christian Science credit for these apparently marvelous cures.

The investigator will also learn that through Christian Science many have been rescued from lives of sin and vice, and that some have been lifted from the very depths of degradation and depravity. He will find that these persons have been restored to their rightful heritage of freedom from evil and have thus become useful members of society. The seeker for facts concerning the effect of Christian Science in human experience will find that many who were not able to succeed in the struggle for existence, believing themselves to be the victims of environment and circumstances resulting in poverty and distress, are now finding their condition greatly improved because Christian Science has given them a new outlook on the world and a new insight into spiritual truth. He will find those who are glad to acknowledge that Christian Science has shown them how to be more honest, just, humble, loving, considerate—in a word, less selfish—than formerly. He will be told that the depressing atmosphere of discouragement and doubt has for many been transformed into an invigorating sense of courage and confidence.

MEANS OF DELIVERANCE.

If the investigator were to inquire how all this came to pass, and could have a concrete answer from all the Christian Scientists on earth, that answer would be, "It is because we have come to know that God is good." A simple answer, is it not? And yet so more simple, and so more profound, than the declaration of the Apostle John that "God is love." (1 John iv. 8.) If as John says, "God is love," then God must also be infinitely good, for if we agree that God is infinite Love, surely we shall agree that infinite, universal, divine Love is identical with all that is good.

Christian Science teaches that God is not both good and evil, but that He is good only. Therefore, God, as understood in Christian Science, is all good and always good. He is never anything else than good, nor ever anything less than infinite. So as a basis for our discussion of Christian Science in some of its phases, we have the fundamental proposition that God is good, not merely in a relative sense, but always and forever immutably and perfectly good.

MIND IS GOOD.
